Notification should be made to the Swiss Government	6

8	Law Officers ..	Nov. 24, 1905	"Scotsman" condemned by Japanese Prize Court for carrying contraband of war to Vladivostok during war with Russia. No grounds exist on the evidence for asking Japanese Government to reconsider the decision	15

MEXICO.

9	Law Officers ..	Sept. 19, 1905	Detention of Alonzo Lewis by Indian Chief at Yalliche in 1902. It is not justifiable to claim compensation therefor from Mexican Government, because Lewis obtained licence to extract gum not from Mexican Government, but from that Chief under conditions which the Mexican Government would not have accorded had they been in effective occupation of the district. Some inexpensive form of arbitration might be resorted to	17

NICARAGUA.

10	Law Officers ..	Nov. 10, 1905	Nicaraguan claim to exclusive turtle fisheries off the Mosquito Coast. Opinion that Sucre Cay, &c., are islands, the test being laid down in Report of Law Officers of March 25, 1875. Cannot form opinion as to claim of Nicaragua to sovereignty over Morrison Cays, which don't appear to be islands. Matter should be settled with Nicaragua	19

PERSIA.

11	Law Officers ..	Feb. 11, 1905	Rights of local tribes to exclusive pearl fisheries on the Arabian Coast of the Persian Gulf and Coast of Bahrein. Their concurrent right exists within the 3-mile limit. Are of opinion that they have acquired an exclusive right of fishing over the pearl banks outside that limit. Case is different as regards the deep-water fisheries. Matter might be referred to Hague Tribunal if foreigners cannot be stopped from fishing by local measures, but better course is to stop such fishing indirectly	21

RUSSIA.

12	Law Officers ..	June 29, 1905	"Hipsang" sunk by Russians during war with Japan. Concur in opinion that Russian Government should be informed that claim for compensation is not a matter for Prize Court, but should be dealt with diplomatically. Difference between this case and one of ordinary interference with vessel suspected of carrying contraband is one of essence, and not of degree	24
13	Law Officers ..	July 7,	Sinking of British vessels "St. Kilda" and "Ikhona" by Russian cruisers. Approving draft despatch to Sir Charles Hardinge, stating that claim compensation should be settled without reference to decision of Prize Court	25

ARGENTINE CONFEDERATION.

No. 1.

[March 31, 1905.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 4, 1905.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list with regard to the treatment of Bright's Light and Power, Limited, by the Argentine Government.

Treatment of Bright's Light and Power Company:

This Company was formed in London in 1898, and duly registered in England according to the Companies Acts. In the same year Mr. Charles Bright sold to the Company Concessions granted to him by the Governments of the Provinces of Salta and Santiago del Estero, in the Argentine Republic, to light the two cities named with electricity. For these Concessions the Company paid 80,000*l.*, of which 35,000*l.* was paid in cash and the rest in shares. Shortly afterwards the Company issued in London a power of attorney to Mr. Valentine Brown to represent them in the Argentine Republic, and the Governments of the two provinces recognized the British status of the Company, which was registered as such in the Commercial Registers of their respective capitals.

The income derived from the working of the electric light stations was regularly received from the local Governments by the Company's duly appointed representatives, and remitted by the latter to the Directors in England until the year 1902. In July of that year Mr. Brown, on his own initiative, improperly transferred the power of attorney which he held on behalf of the Company to M. Gonzalez Segura, an Argentine gentleman, who had interests conflicting with those of the Company, but who for a time recognized the status of the latter as a British Company constituted in accordance with the requirements of English law. Difficulties with M. Gonzalez Segura then became accentuated, and the Company gave instructions, which were carried out, to revoke the power of attorney given to Mr. Brown, and consequently that held by M. Gonzalez Segura. The formal withdrawal of the power was notified to M. Segura, and brought to the knowledge of the Argentine Government. Moreover, the British Directors, on the 10th September, 1902, obtained a decision in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, before Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady, to the effect that they, and not certain other individuals, were the proper persons to control the business of Bright's Light and Power, Limited.

In February 1903 Mr. Bright was declared a bankrupt in the Argentine Republic, and a person named Anatole appointed trustee. M. Gonzalez Segura, and others in Argentina, then obtained possession of the property and plant at Salta and Santiago del Estero, and proceeded to work the electric light stations for their own benefit, and to appropriate the profits. It is not quite clear by what methods this was done, but it appears probable that M. Gonzalez Segura made use of the revoked power of attorney as an instrument against the British Directors, and also induced certain shareholders in Argentina to deny the authority of the British Directors to represent the majority of the shareholders of the Company.

At the request of Messrs. Bennett and Chance, solicitors to Bright's Light and Power, Limited (Paper A), Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady's order and judgment, duly authenticated, were transmitted to His Majesty's Legation at Buenos Ayres in May 1903 (Paper B), with instructions to forward them to the Government of the Argentine Republic, and to obtain, if possible, recognition of the order and judgment in that Republic, with a view to enable Bright's Light and Power, Limited, to obtain possession of their property situate within its territory. The documents were duly communicated to the Argentine Courts, but His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Buenos Ayres reported in a despatch of the 18th June, 1903 (Paper C), that action before the latter was suspended, owing to the fact that friendly negotiations had been initiated between Messrs. Bennett and Henry, the representatives of the Company in Argentina, and M. Gonzalez Segura. It appeared from letters of the 7th June and 6th July, 1904 (Papers D and E), received from Messrs. Bennett, Chance, and Ferris, the Company's representatives in England, that the negotiations resulted in the signature of an agreement on the 24th June, 1903, by which M. Gonzalez Segura consented to hand over to Messrs. Bennett and Henry the electric light stations at Salta and Santiago, and also to surrender the power of attorney transferred to him by Mr. Brown, on consideration of being allowed to retain the income wrongfully collected by him and his friends up to the date of signature.

In their letter of the 7th June last, already referred to, Messrs. Bennett, Chance, and Ferris informed this Department that the Agreement of the 24th June, 1903, had not been carried out, and that the Company had not yet succeeded in obtaining possession of their property. It was stated that M. Gonzalez Segura had evaded this obligation by inducing the Argentine Government to declare the Company an Argentine instead of a British concern, and it was added that this had been obtained by bringing improper influences to bear on the Government. Mr. Haggard, His Majesty's Minister at Buenos Ayres, was consequently instructed (Paper F) to make an informal representation to the Argentine Government on the subject, and a despatch has recently been received from him (Paper G) reporting that the Minister of Justice has promised to give his personal attention to the case.

At the same time Mr. Haggard reports facts which appear to support, in a measure, the allegations of the Company, and which seem to Lord Lansdowne to raise important issues affecting the welfare, and even the existence, of many vast British enterprises in the Argentine Republic.

On the 16th November, 1903, the Argentine Government declared by Decree that Bright's Light and Power (Limited) was not to be regarded as a foreign, but an Argentine concern, and gave them ninety days to adapt themselves to their new character, under pain of having their authorization to carry on business withdrawn. This Decree was issued on the strength of an opinion expressed by Dr. Sabiniano Kier, the Attorney-General (Inclosure B in Paper G), and is in opposition to a decision, previously given by the Judge of First Instance, to the effect that the Company was not an Argentine concern. In this opinion Dr. Kier gave reasons for which he considered that the status of the Company was Argentine, and maintained that the Executive were themselves competent to decide the character and legal status (personeria juridica) of the Company, regardless of the legal decision mentioned above.

At a later date the Commercial Court of Appeal, in a final sentence, also declared Bright's Light and Power Company to be a foreign concern; but, in spite of this second decision, Dr. Kier presented another Report, upholding his former opinion and maintaining that the Executive had "the essentially administrative faculty of according or withdrawing the legal status (personeria juridica) from associations constituted in this or in a foreign country." Acting apparently on this opinion, the Argentine Government announced by a Decree, dated the 19th April, 1904, that, in view of the fact that the Company had neglected to conform to the Order contained in the Decree of the 16th November, 1903, their authorization to act as a Limited Company was withdrawn. (Inclosure D in Paper G.)

Lord Lansdowne is disposed to think that, although the Argentine Government possess the right to accord or refuse to a foreign Company the authorization to carry on business in the Republic, they are not entitled to act as they appear to have done in the present instance. The authorization had already been obtained, and enjoyed for a considerable time by Bright's Light and Power, Limited, when the Government suppressed the legal existence of the Company in Argentina on the ground that the Company had failed to comply with the previous Decree, and to undergo reconstruction as an Argentine Company. His Lordship is also disposed to think that the Argentine Government have no right to dispute the status of a Company duly constituted in accordance with English law, in the absence of any proof that they have lost their original character.

I am to request that you will take these papers into your consideration, and that you will favour Lord Lansdowne with your opinion whether the case is one which calls for official representation, and, if so, on what special grounds such a representation can most advantageously be based.

His Lordship would also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a more general nature which you may be disposed to offer on the subject.

I have, &c.

Report.

In our opinion, the case is one which calls for official representation. We think the representation should be based on the grounds (1) that the Company was a duly constituted British Company, and had been recognized for some years as such by the Government of the Argentine Republic; (2) that the Courts of the country had decided in favour of the contentions of the Company, and that to overrule their decision by an executive act would appear to be contrary to justice; and (3) that, even if it was in accordance with the laws of the Argentine Republic that an executive act could override the decisions of the Courts, there were no grounds justifying the exercise of such executive power. It will, of course, be necessary in support of, and in order to explain, such contentions to state clearly the main facts of the case.

Brunei Draft Order in Council.

WHEREAS by "The Brunei Order in Council, 1901" (hereinafter referred to as the Principal Order), certain fines, penalties, and other sums of money are stated in terms of dollar currency, and it is expedient that the same should be stated in terms of British currency, provision being made for payments in dollars at temporary rates of exchange, and that those rates of exchange should apply to the ascertainment of value in cases where any value is required to be reckoned in terms of British currency;

Now, therefore, His Majesty, by virtue and in exercise of the powers in this behalf by "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," or otherwise in His Majesty vested, is pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, as follows:—

1. The Principal Order shall be amended as follows:
Five pounds shall be substituted for fifty dollars in Articles 11, 16, 25, and 89;
Twenty pounds shall be substituted for two hundred dollars in Articles 64 and 86;
Fifty pounds shall be substituted for five hundred dollars in Articles 38, 41, 66, 68, 69, and 89;
Two hundred pounds shall be substituted for two thousand dollars in Article 69;
Five hundred pounds shall be substituted for five thousand dollars in Article 37.
2. All fees, fines, penalties, and other sums of money which, under the provisions of the Principal Order as amended by this Order, or of any other Order or any Rules or Regulations, are stated or imposed in terms of British currency shall, if not paid in British gold, be paid at the rate of ten dollars to the pound sterling, or at such other rate as may be from time to time fixed by the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury.

The rate of exchange for the time being in force under this Article shall apply to the ascertainment of any value for the purposes of any limitation, security, or qualification in any case where, under the Principal Order (as amended by this Order), or any other Order, or any Rules or Regulations, such value is required to be reckoned in terms of British currency.

3. This Order shall take effect on such day not less than one month, nor more than two months, after it is first publicly exhibited at Brunei, as the Consul shall appoint.

4. This Order may be cited as "The Brunei Order in Council, 1905."

Accession of New Zealand and Queensland to Industrial Property Convention, 1883; and their position
as to
Act, 1900.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit for your consideration the papers noted in the accompanying list relating to the accession of New Zealand to the Industrial Property Convention, 1883, as amended by the Additional Act of 1900, and the position of the Colonies of New Zealand and Queensland with reference thereto.

The Industrial Property Convention, of which a copy is inclosed (Paper B), was originally concluded at Paris on the 20th March, 1883. Her late Majesty the Queen acceded for the United Kingdom on the 17th March, 1884, on the understanding that power to accede on behalf of any Colony was reserved. Her accession on these terms was accepted on the 2nd April, 1884 (see "State Papers," vol. lxxv, p. 414).

On the 7th September, 1891, Her Majesty adhered, on behalf of New Zealand and Queensland, to the Convention of 1883 (Paper C).

It appears from a letter of the International Bureau at Berne to the Board of Trade of the 29th January, 1891* (see p. 18 of the Print, Paper A), that it was possible for British Colonies to join as independent parties or as forming one party with the mother country from the moment of their adherence. New Zealand and Queensland joined on the latter footing.

In 1900 the Powers, including Great Britain, joined in an "Additional Act," introducing into the Convention of 1883 a number of small amendments. Before signing the Act the British Delegates made a declaration to the effect that they acted on behalf of the United Kingdom alone, and reserved to Her Majesty's Government a right to adhere on behalf of any Colony (Paper D).

In 1903 His Majesty's Government instructed His Majesty's Representative at Berne to notify the accession of New Zealand to the Convention of 1883, as modified by the Additional Act of 1900 (Paper A, No. 4).

For certain constitutional reasons connected with the Federation of Australia a similar notification on behalf of Queensland was suspended.

After some correspondence as to whether the notification should be addressed to the Government of Belgium or that of Switzerland, the International Bureau at Berne adopted the attitude that, as Great Britain had joined in the Additional Act of 1900, New Zealand and Queensland, who had acceded before 1900, were already bound by the Additional Act, but they offered, if Belgium consented, to accept the notification of the adherence of New Zealand without prejudice to the question of principle (see No. 12 in the Print, Paper A, pp. 13-16).

In a Memorandum dated the 5th November, 1903 (see p. 17 of the Print, Paper A), Mr. Risley, Legal Assistant in the Colonial Office, advised Mr. Secretary Lyttelton that the contention of the International Bureau was correct, and that, so far as regards participation in the Additional Act, New Zealand must be regarded as an appendage of Great Britain, and already bound by the Act of the mother country. He also advised that, in the declaration of the British Delegates in 1900 that they signed only for the United Kingdom, the United Kingdom must be taken to have included Queensland and New Zealand. For the actual words of this declaration see Minute on page 23 of Paper A, paragraph 3.

This view is strongly contested by Sir H. Bergne, one of the Delegates making the declaration in question, who contends that this is neither the sense in which it was accepted by the Delegates nor in accordance with the plain and simple meaning of its language. This latter view is shared by the Librarian and also by the Heads of the Commercial and Treaty Departments of this Office (see pp. 19, 23, 29-33 of the Print).

On the other hand, both Mr. Davidson, K.C., the Legal Adviser to this Department, and Mr. Hurst, the Assistant Legal Adviser, applying to the case the rules of technical legal construction, have arrived at the same conclusion as the International Bureau at Berne and Mr. Risley (see pp. 24-27, and 30 of the Print, Paper A).

In the course of the correspondence the question was raised as to whether, as a general principle, a Treaty entered into by the United Kingdom is—in the absence of any express provision—binding upon the whole of His Majesty's dominions. Some-what divergent views on this point appear to be expressed in the Colonial Office letters of the 10th and 30th November, 1903 (Paper A, Nos. 14 and 15). It is, however, understood that while the letter of the 30th November contained an expression of Mr. Secretary Lyttelton's opinion on the point which he has so far seen no reason to revise, that of the 10th merely suggested a cautious form of reply to the Government of the Swiss Confederation, which would leave this important question still open.

I am to request that you will take these papers into your consideration and favour Lord Lansdowne with your opinion—

1. To what extent a Treaty entered into by His Majesty for the United Kingdom, is, in the absence of any expressed provision to the contrary, binding upon the whole of His Majesty's dominions?

2. Whether New Zealand and Queensland are or are not already bound by the Additional Act of 1900?

3. If not so bound, what is the present position of those Colonies with reference to (a) the Convention of 1883, and (b) the Additional Act of 1900?

4. What interpretation should be placed upon the declaration made by the British Delegates before signing the Additional Act of 1900?

5. Is His Majesty entitled to notify the accession of New Zealand to (a) the Convention of 1883 as modified by the Additional Act of 1900, or (b) to the Additional Act of 1900 alone?

6. To whom should any such notification be addressed?

His Lordship would also be glad to be favoured with any observation of a general character which you may have to offer.

I have, &c.

1. It is impossible to give a general answer to this question. It must depend upon the nature of the Treaty and the surrounding circumstances.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, December 20, 1904.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit to you the accompanying papers, noted below, respecting an inquiry made by Baron Bildt, the Swedish-Norwegian Minister at this Court, as to whether the new Swedish Law of the 8th July, 1904, regulating the solemnization of marriages between Swedish subjects by Swedish Diplomatic and Consular officers abroad can be put in force in this country without coming into conflict with local jurisdiction.

No definite rule ever appears to have been laid down on the subject of Embassy and Consular marriages solemnized in this country by foreign officials.

The Act 4 Geo. IV, cap. 76, section 21, attaches a heavy penalty to the solemnization of marriages in this country by any person in any other place than a church, or such public chapel wherein banns may be lawfully published, and section 22 of the same Act provides that marriages so solemnized shall be deemed null and void for all purposes whatsoever.

As regards marriages performed in a foreign Embassy or Legation in this country, the question of diplomatic privilege arises, and upon this point some divergence of opinion would seem to exist. The late Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, Sir A. Cockburn, in a Memorandum attached to the Report of the Royal Commission of 1876 on fugitive slaves, held that a foreign Ambassador was in all respects exempt from the law, both civil and criminal, and therefore immune from all penalties.

Hammick, in "The Marriage Law of England," expresses a very similar opinion, but, with regard to the recognition of marriages solemnized at a foreign Embassy, he inclines to the view that a marriage between a British subject and a foreigner so solemnized would not by itself be recognized as legally binding upon the British subject for civil purposes in this country.

The Royal Commission on the Law of Marriage, in their Report of July 1868, touched upon the subject of marriages in foreign Embassies in England in cases where one of the parties to the marriage was a British subject, but they said nothing as to cases where both parties were subjects of the country in whose Embassy the marriage was solemnized: whether or not they considered the latter class as valid can only be gathered, if at all, by inference.

None of these opinions apply to marriages solemnized at foreign Consulates in this country, but the question of their validity has been raised on two occasions in recent years. In 1890 it came up in connection with a new Brazilian marriage law under which Consular marriages in Brazil could be recognized by the local authorities in cases where reciprocity was given in Foreign States, and in 1897 the Belgian Minister made similar inquiries as to the validity of Belgian Consular marriages in Great Britain. In neither case was any definite opinion expressed. In 1890 the point was referred to the Registrar-General, who replied that marriages at foreign Consulates in this country were entirely beyond his cognizance, and that the statutes which he administered did not recognize them in any way, and made no provision for making them valid in England; and accordingly in 1897, in response to his inquiry, the Belgian Minister was informed in the sense of the Registrar-General's reply. No mention was made, however, of the Act 4 Geo. IV, which purports to inflict penalties on persons solemnizing marriages in this country otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of that statute, and it seems difficult to avoid the conclusion that a foreign Consul who enjoys no diplomatic privilege would, by performing such a marriage, render himself liable to those penalties, even though diplomatic privilege prevented proceedings being taken in the case of a marriage at a foreign Embassy or Legation.

No question is asked by Baron Bildt with regard to the recognition by English law of marriages solemnized by Swedish officials under the Swedish law now in question, but it would be of material assistance to Lord Lansdowne in determining what course to adopt to know whether you consider these marriages would be recognized in the English Courts.

I am to request that you will be so good as to take these papers into your consideration and furnish his Lordship with your opinion:—

1. Whether marriages solemnized at (a) foreign Embassies and Legations, and (b) at foreign Consulates in this country, are affected by the Statute 4 Geo. IV, cap. 76, and if so, to what extent in each case.

2. Whether marriages solemnized at (a) foreign Embassies and Legations and (b) at foreign Consulates in this country between (a) two parties, one of whom at least was a subject or citizen of the country represented by such Embassy or Consulate, and neither of whom were British subjects, and (b) between two parties, one of whom was a subject or citizen of the country represented by such Embassy or Consulate, and the other of whom was a British subject, would be regarded as valid in contemplation of English law.

3. Whether any, and if so what, steps should be taken to discourage the solemnization of marriages in this country by foreign Diplomatic and Consular Representatives.

Lord Lansdowne will also be glad to receive any further observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer on the subject.

I have, &c.

Report.

1. In our opinion, marriages solemnized at a foreign Embassy in this country between subjects of the country to which the Embassy belongs are not, but that other marriages at Embassies and all marriages solemnized at a foreign Consulate are, affected by the Statute 4 George IV, cap. 76.

2. The only marriages solemnized at a foreign Embassy in this country which, in our opinion, would be regarded as valid in contemplation of English law are those between two subjects of the country represented by such Embassy. No marriage solemnized at a Consulate would be regarded as valid. We speak of cases in which the requirements of English municipal law have not been complied with.

3. This is a question of policy, but we think it might be well that foreign Governments should be made aware that no marriages at Embassies and Consulates, other than such as are mentioned as valid in No. 2, would be regarded as valid in contemplation of English law.

[July 29, 1905.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

*Foreign Office, March 27, 1905.*Position of Canada
under Copyright Conventions.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit herewith copies of documents, mentioned in the inclosed list, in connection with the question as to the competency of Canada to carry out her obligations as regards copyright for works of art under the International Copyright Convention of 1886, and the Additional Act of the 4th May, 1896.

In September last a Memorandum (Paper A) was communicated to this Office by the French Ambassador asking for information as to the position of Canada with regard to the International Copyright Convention of 1886, and inquiring whether foreigners—even if subjects of a State which is a party to the Convention—must, in order to obtain copyright in Canada, reprint their works in that country, and what law actually applies to such a case.

In reply, his Excellency was informed on the 2nd November (Paper B), that Canada is bound by the Copyright Convention of 1886, and by the Additional Act of 1896 (Papers C and D), and that by virtue of the British law, as completed by the International Copyright Act of 1886 (Paper E), and by the Order in Council of 1887 (Paper F), (1), the author of a book first published in any part of the King's dominions has, irrespective of his nationality, copyright in the book throughout the King's dominions for the term allowed by English law; and (2), that the author of a book first published in any country belonging to the Copyright Union, say at Paris, has copyright throughout the King's dominions for the same term or any less term allowed by the law of the foreign country for copyright under that law. It was further stated that by virtue of the Convention no further registration or formality is required in Canada for works which are entitled to copyright within the Union, and that there is, therefore, no obligation to reprint or republish, the mere fact that a work has copyright in the Union giving it copyright throughout His Majesty's dominions.

A notice of this reply was published in the "Droit d'Auteur" (Paper G), the official publication of the International Copyright Bureau, in which Lord Lansdowne is represented to have stated that literary and artistic works, of which the copyright is recognized by the Union, are not required to undergo fresh formalities or to be reprinted in Canada. This notice will be found on p. 9 of the inclosed copy of the "Droit d'Auteur."

As a matter of fact, the note of the 2nd November (Paper B), referred only to literary works, and is correct so far as it goes. The Report (Paper H) of the Inter-departmental Committee of 1892 related specifically to literary copyright alone, and assumed that the operation of the Imperial Copyright Acts extended to the whole of the British dominions, and this principle was affirmed in a decision of the Appeal Court in Canada in the case of Smiles v. Belford in 1877. There appears to have been no subsequent judicial decision to a contrary effect.

As regards artistic copyright, however, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of the 28th July, 1903, gave a judgment in the case of Graves and Co. v. Gorrie (Paper I) to the effect that the Imperial Act of 1862 (Paper J), which grants copyright to artistic works first published in the United Kingdom, does not extend to give protection beyond the limits of the United Kingdom, that is to say it does not give copyright in such artistic works in Canada.

The matter would therefore appear to be regulated by the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1886, cap. 62, sec. 5 (Paper K), which prescribes as the condition for obtaining copyright that literary, scientific, or artistic works shall be printed and published, or reprinted and republished in Canada.

The above-mentioned decision settles the law as regards an artistic work first published in the United Kingdom, but it is conceived that a foreign artist might perhaps be placed in a more favourable position than a British artist by reason of the closing words of section 9 of the Act of 1886 (the International Copyright Act) (Paper E), which enact that "the said Acts (that is to say, 7 & 8 Vict., cap. 12; 15 & 16 Vict., cap. 12; 38 & 39 Vict., cap. 12; and 25 and 26 Vict., cap. 68, sec. 12), and this Act, shall apply to every British possession as if it were part of the United Kingdom."

GENERAL.

An artist publishing in the United Kingdom would clearly have copyright there, and it might be possibly contended that these words operate to extend the foreigner's rights, though according to the decision above referred to, they do not so operate with regard to a British artist's rights.

I am to request that you will be good enough to take the inclosed papers into your consideration, and to favour his Lordship with your opinion as to whether, under section 9 of the International Copyright Act of 1886, artistic works first produced abroad in a country which is a party to the Berne International Convention of the 9th December, 1886, do acquire copyright in Canada as distinct from works first produced in the United Kingdom.

Report.

This question is one of considerable difficulty, but we think that it should be answered in the affirmative. Unless this view is correct no effect whatever is given in the British possessions to international copyright in works of art. We ought, however, to point out that section 3 of the Order in Council of 1887 may be open to a different construction, and may have been considered by the Canadian Government to affect the question. The point may be raised and decided at the instance of the owner of the foreign copyright by proceedings in the Canadian Courts with an appeal to the Privy Council. Until a decision to the contrary is given, we think that His Majesty's Government should act upon the view which we have above indicated. If the decision should be to the contrary, His Majesty's Government may consider it right to endeavour to correct by legislation the failure to carry out the terms of the Convention in this respect.

CASE.

BY "The Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889" (52 & 53 Vict., cap. 23), which (section 2) "extends only to Scotland and to the parts of the sea adjoining Scotland," it is enacted:—

"7.—(1.) The Fishery Board may, by bye-law or bye-laws, direct that the methods of fishing known as beam trawling and otter trawling shall not be used within a line drawn from Duncansby Head, in Caithness, to Rattray Point, in Aberdeenshire, in any area or areas to be defined in such bye-law, and may from time to time make, alter, and revoke bye-laws for the purposes of this section, but no such bye-law shall be of any validity until it has been confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland."

(2.) [For this sub-section the following provision is substituted by section 10 of "The Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895":—]

"(4.) Any person who uses any such method of fishing in contravention of any such bye-law shall be liable, on conviction under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, to a fine not exceeding 100*l.*, and failing immediate payment of the fine, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days, without prejudice to diligence by pointing or arrestment, if no imprisonment has followed on the conviction; and every net set, or attempted to be set, in contravention of any such bye-law may be seized and destroyed or otherwise disposed of by any Superintendent of the herring fishery or other officers employed in the execution of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Acts. Provided always that, if no conviction shall follow, any net so seized shall be forthwith returned, and due compensation made for any loss or damage occasioned thereto by such seizure."

The Fishery Board for Scotland, under the powers given by the above section, made the following bye-law, dated the 27th September, 1892, and duly confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland on the 22nd November, 1892:—

"Whereas by the Act 52 & 53 Vict., cap. 23, being the aforesaid "Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889," it is enacted that the Fishery Board for Scotland may, by bye-law or bye-laws, direct that the method of fishing known as beam trawling or otter trawling shall not be used within a line drawn from Duncansby Head, in Caithness, to Rattray Point, in Aberdeenshire, in any area or areas to be defined 'in such bye-law,' it is hereby declared that the foregoing provision shall apply to the whole of the area above specified.

"Within the aforesaid area, as above defined, no person, unless in the service or possessing the written authority of the said Fishery Board for Scotland, under the hand of the Secretary thereof, shall at any time, from the date when this bye-law shall come into force, use any beam trawl, or otter trawl, for taking sea fish."

The area defined by this bye-law is known as the Moray Firth. It includes a very large extent of sea outside the 3-mile limit; and the question has been raised whether it is competent for the Fishery Board for Scotland under the above Act to make a bye-law which would have the effect of preventing English and Irish fishermen from trawling in waters outside the 3-mile limit. His Majesty's Government have undertaken to submit this question for the Opinion of the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General for England, the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor-General for Scotland, and the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General for Ireland.

The Law Officers are therefore requested to advise whether an English or Irish fisherman, acting in contravention of the bye-law in question, is liable, on conviction, to the penalties imposed by section 10 (4) of "The Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895."

The Attorney and Solicitor-General for England, the Lord Advocate and Solicitor-General for Scotland, and the Attorney and Solicitor-General for Ireland are requested to favour the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries with their Opinion on the question raised in the foregoing Case.

Opinion.

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

The power of the Imperial Parliament to legislate for British subjects, whether within or without His Majesty's dominions, is beyond question, and there is no ambiguity in the enactment.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, October 6, 1905.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list, which relate to an inquiry made by the Belgian Minister (see Paper A) as to what extent the servants of foreign Diplomatic Agents in this country enjoy immunity from criminal jurisdiction, and if it makes any difference whether these domestic servants are foreigners or British subjects.

The Minutes which accompany Count de Lalaing's note (Paper B), and the papers referred to therein (Papers C, D, and E), show that, after consideration of the matter, in the light of the information furnished by the archives of this Department, a draft reply to Count de Lalaing was prepared (Paper F), informing him of the practice habitually adopted in this country in such cases.

When this draft was prepared, however, Mr. Davidson, K.C., the Legal Adviser to this Department, expressed very great doubt whether the propositions it enunciated were sound, and it was therefore referred to the Home Office (Paper G) for their observations.

Two letters from the Home Office are also inclosed (Papers H and I), the latter of which contains a Memorandum setting forth very fully the information in the possession of that Department on the subject of diplomatic privilege.

I am to add, by way of explanation, that the Inter-Departmental Conference referred to in the later correspondence has not been held, but as the Belgian Minister wishes an early reply, his Lordship desires now to refer the matter for your consideration.

It appears to Lord Lansdowne that the Home Office Memorandum makes it clear that the law, i.e., the exact extent and basis of the immunity, is ill-defined and vague, but that the practice—which is the important matter—is fairly correctly set forth in the draft reply to Count de Lalaing.

His Lordship assumes that the practice in these matters must be subject to the overriding right of a State to take such measures as may be necessary for its protection, and to the further limitation that no State would tolerate, and no Ambassador would countenance, flagrant breaches of the law on the part of the latter's servants. Subject to these limitations, however, the proposition that a Diplomatic Agent's servants are not prosecuted without the consent of their master appears to his Lordship to be correct.

In some parts of the Home Office Memorandum there are statements which throw doubt on the proposition that a servant could be prosecuted after dismissal for an act or offence committed before dismissal and while still in the service of the Diplomatic Agent.

His Lordship is advised that this proposition is correct; the immunity of the servant is purely derivative, and is the privilege of the master, being allowed to the latter in order to facilitate the exercise of his diplomatic functions, and to insure to him freedom from interference by the local authorities.

There appears, therefore, to be no reason for extending the immunity beyond those who are actually in his service.

I am to request that you will take the papers inclosed herewith into your consideration, and that you will favour his Lordship with your opinion whether the terms of the proposed reply to Count de Lalaing are, in the circumstances, right and proper, or whether they should be amended, and, if so, in what respect. His Lordship would also be glad to be furnished with any general observations in the matter which you may be good enough to offer.

Report.

We suggest that the reply should be modified in the sense of the rider which we have appended to the draft.

We think that the present draft reply goes too far in the way of admitting immunity, and might entail very inconvenient consequences if any case of gravity, such as murder or rape, should unfortunately occur.

We think that the present practice of communicating with the foreign Minister and of discontinuing proceedings in trifling cases—if he claims exemption for his servants—is convenient, but that it should not be recognized as a matter of right, or as applicable to cases of gravity, especially when the crime is committed outside the limits of the Minister's residence.

Draft of Letter from the Marquess of Lansdowne to Count de Lalaing.

Sir, Foreign Office, 1905.
WITH reference to your note of the 23rd February, 1904, in which you inquire whether the servants of foreign Diplomatic Agents are exempt from local jurisdiction as regards criminal offences, and, if so, to what extent, I have the honour to inform you in reply [that the practice adopted in this country is as follows:—

If it is found that any person against whom criminal proceedings have been initiated is the servant of a foreign Diplomatic Agent, steps are taken to procure the suspension of the proceedings until the Diplomatic Agent has been communicated with, and they are not continued without his consent.

No distinction is for this purpose drawn between servants who are of foreign, and those who are of British, nationality.

If the Diplomatic Agent prefers to deal with the matter himself, and either punish or remove the servant out of the jurisdiction in the event of his being considered guilty, the criminal proceedings are discontinued.

On the other hand, if the Diplomatic Agent prefers to waive his privilege or dismiss the servant, so as to terminate his employment, the proceedings in the Criminal Court would follow their ordinary course.]

Rider suggested by Law Officers in place of passage in brackets.

... that there is no Statute dealing with this matter, and there are no decided cases settling the question of legal liability.

It has never been held that the servants of foreign Diplomatic Agents enjoy an immunity from criminal process, and it cannot be conceded that such immunity exists as a matter of right—more especially in cases of gravity affecting the public peace.

If, however, it is found that any person against whom criminal proceedings have been initiated is the servant of a foreign Diplomatic Agent, it is the practice in this country, at once to communicate with that Diplomatic Agent, and it has not been unusual, in cases of a trifling character, to drop the proceedings if immunity is claimed for the accused.

Foreign Office, November 17, 1905.

Gentlemen,
I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list, which relate to the condemnation of the steam-ship "Scotsman," which vessel was seized on the 14th February last in the Tsugaru Straits by a Japanese torpedo-boat.

The "Scotsman," the property of the Lombard Steam-ship Company, of 20, Great St. Helens, E.C., was on a voyage from Saigon to Vladivostok with a cargo of about 20,000 bags of rice, consigned to that port by the agents in Saigon of Messrs. R. Peletz and Co.—the charterers of the steamer—and the bills of lading stated that the cargo was deliverable to order. The "Scotsman" left Saigon on the 24th January, 1905, without being furnished with a copy of the charter-party, her declared destination being Vladivostok, and, after calling at Hong Kong, was captured by the Japanese naval authorities as above stated.

The steamer was taken into the Yokosuka Prize Court for adjudication, and, on the 7th June, 1905, was condemned by that Court as a lawful prize. A translation of the finding of the Court will be found inclosed in Sir C. MacDonald's despatch No. 37, Treaty, of the 28th June last (Paper F).

The underwriters of the cargo appealed against this decision, and on the 5th September last the higher Prize Court confirmed the sentence of the lower Court, condemned the "Scotsman" as a lawful prize, and ordered her cargo to be confiscated. The text of the judgment of the higher Court is contained in Inclosure 2 in Sir C. MacDonald's despatch No. 64, Treaty, of the 6th October last (Paper P).

Meanwhile Messrs. Parker, Garrett, and Co., representing the underwriters, and Mr. W. C. Lockhart, representing the Shanghai Agency of the World Marine Insurance

"Scotsman" condemned by Japanese

with Russia.

Company, have repeatedly urged His Majesty's Government to make a representation to the Japanese Government, through the diplomatic channel, against the decision of the Japanese Prize Court. The case for the underwriters is very fully set forth in the letter from Messrs. Parker, Garrett, and Co. of the 8th September last (Paper H).

Up to the present His Majesty's Government have maintained the attitude that, unless and until the British subjects interested in the vessel shall have exhausted the ordinary legal remedies open to them before the Tribunals of Japan with the result that a prima facie case of miscarriage or denial of justice appears, they will not be in a position to make a formal representation, on behalf of the parties, to the Japanese Government. The higher Prize Court having now finally condemned the "Scotsman" and her cargo, the question arises whether any representation on the subject should be made to the Japanese Government.

As at present advised, Lord Lansdowne considers that the answer to this question should be in the negative. In this case the owners of the "Scotsman" knowingly allowed their vessel to be used during a state of war for the purpose of carrying food-stuffs, the property of a belligerent Government, to Vladivostok, which at that time was a naval arsenal and harbour belonging to that belligerent Government. These facts are admitted by the solicitors to the underwriters, who, however, apparently contend that because Vladivostok was at the time a non-blockaded port, the vessel is therefore not liable to confiscation. As regards the latter contention, his Lordship is of opinion that the fact that Vladivostok was a non-blockaded port has no bearing upon the question. It seems abundantly clear that the "Scotsman" was condemned because her cargo was held, in the circumstances, to be contraband, and because the ship-owner was privy to its carriage. For these reasons, therefore, it appears to his Lordship that the case is not one in which a representation to the Japanese Government would be justified. Before, however, arriving at a final decision in the matter, I am to request that you will take the inclosed papers into your consideration, and will favour Lord Lansdowne with your opinion as to whether, having regard to the considerations stated above, his Lordship would be warranted in declining to submit the case of the "Scotsman" for the reconsideration of the Japanese Government.

His Lordship would also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general character which you may desire to offer upon the papers now submitted to you.

Report.

In our opinion no valid grounds exist for submitting the case of the "Scotsman" for the reconsideration of the Japanese Government. There is ample evidence that "the object of the vessel's voyage was the carriage of contraband of war," as found by the higher Prize Court, and we see no reason for impeaching the conclusions at which it arrived.

Foreign Office, August 28, 1905.

Gentlemen,

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit to you the accompanying volume of correspondence and to call your attention more especially to the papers marked in the list inclosed herewith relative to the claim put forward by Alonzo Lewis, a British subject, against the Mexican Government on account of his arrest and forcible detention at Yalisco in Mexico in 1902.

The origin of the claim is given in a letter from the Colonial Office of the 10th July, 1902 (Paper A). From this it appears that in a remote part of the Republic of Mexico Mr. Lewis was engaged in bleeding trees for chicle gum, having obtained for this purpose the permission of a local Indian Chief, General Tamay, who exercised some kind of authority in the district. Mr. Lewis was grievously ill-used by some of the Indians under Tamay's orders while engaged in this occupation, and claimed 1,000*l.* as compensation. As this amount was considered somewhat excessive, Mr. Greville, His Majesty's Minister at Mexico, was instructed (Paper B), in making a representation to the Mexican Government on the subject, to claim only 700*l.*, this sum being considered sufficient to meet the merits of the case. A reply was received from His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires (Paper C), in which he reported that the Mexican Government repudiated all liability, on the ground that they were not responsible for Tamay's actions, that their authority in the district of Ycaiche, where Yalisco is situated, was merely nominal, and that Mr. Lewis had entirely ignored all the Mexican laws which regulate the working of forests and the exportation of chicle. They adopted, in fact, the position that they could not be expected to pay compensation to a man who had broken Mexican law for his own purposes and had suffered ill-treatment at the hands of persons over whom the Mexican Government had no control, and for whose proceedings they were not responsible. They also pointed out that Mr. Lewis might have brought the case before the Mexican Courts of Justice.

His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies, on the other hand, maintained (Papers D and E) that the Mexican Government ought to be held liable for Tamay's actions. This view is based upon the fact that in a report from the Governor of the State of Campeche (inclosure in Paper C) occurs a sentence to the effect that "there is in addition another canton submissive to the authorities through an intelligent Indian named Felipe Tamay, who calls himself General and makes his authority felt by the inhabitants of the canton, &c.," which is held to be an admission that the Mexican authorities exercise control over Tamay; and also upon the fact that the Superintendent of Police in British Honduras states in a Minute dated the 11th March, 1902 (inclosure in Paper A), that on one of the licences to bleed chicle, signed by General Tamay, there is a Mexican Government stamp.

This evidence does not appear to Lord Lansdowne to be very strong. The sentence in the Governor's Report may mean no more than that Tamay found it to his advantage to preserve some semblance of order in the hope that the Mexican authorities would then allow him to remain in peace; while, with regard to the second argument, his Lordship is disposed to think that it is more than likely a police officer in British Honduras might mistake a counterfeit stamp for a genuine one, and that, even if the stamp were genuine, it would be easy for the Mexican Government to say that it had been improperly obtained by the Indians. The real extent of the Mexican authority in the district is illustrated by a statement contained in Mr. Grant Duff's despatch No. 28 of the 22nd July, 1904 (Paper F), that the Government have not yet been able to communicate with Ycaiche, the centre of Tamay's influence, though it is now three years since the claim arose.

Lord Lansdowne believes it is essential to the success of the claim upon its present basis to establish conclusively the responsibility of Mexico for Tamay's action, and he is doubtful whether the evidence as yet adduced is sufficient for this purpose. In these circumstances, his Lordship requests that you will take the accompanying papers into your consideration, and favour him with your opinion as to whether the evidence at present in the possession of His Majesty's Government is sufficient to warrant the claim being pressed on the Mexican Government on its present basis.

It has been suggested to Lord Lansdowne that it might be possible to adopt the following line of argument in support of the claim, if it should ultimately be decided that the Mexican Government cannot be held directly responsible for Tamay's action:—

Mexico, as a State, is responsible for preserving within her territories a reasonable measure of good government, and traders and travellers are entitled to assume that the individuals whom they find exercising authority are the properly constituted officials of the Central Power. If they are not, the public should be warned that they enter the territory at their own risk, or else the State should cease to lay claim to the territory. Any State is entitled to close particular portions of her territory in time of rebellion or for other temporary cause, but in the present case no such warning was given, and the absence of effective control by the Mexican Government in the district concerned appears to be perennial. Every State is bound to provide throughout her territories reasonable facilities for enabling persons who have been the victims of injustice at the hands of others to obtain redress for their grievances; and as Mexico does not admit liability for the actions of General Tamay, and regards him as a private individual, she is bound to provide Mr. Lewis with reasonable facilities to recover damages from Tamay, by legal process or other means, for the injustice suffered at his hands. If she fails to do so, she must herself provide Mr. Lewis with compensation.

His Lordship will be glad to be favoured with your opinion whether His Majesty's Government could justifiably adopt the above or some analogous grounds as the basis of a claim on behalf of Mr. Lewis.

Lord Lansdowne also hopes that he may receive any observations of a more general nature which you may be disposed to offer.

Report.

In our opinion His Majesty's Government would not be justified in insisting upon payment to Mr. Lewis.

Tamay appears to be for all practical purposes independent owing to distance and difficulty of access. This would not prevent Mr. Lewis from being entitled to compensation from the Mexican Government if he had proceeded to Tamay's territory under a licence from that Government. As the Mexican Government claims that Tamay's territory is part of their dominions, they would, in the case supposed, be answerable for his misconduct.

But Mr. Lewis did not act under any licence from the Mexican Government. He took his licence from the semi-barbarous Chief whom he found in actual control of the territory, and on terms which, according to the statement of the Mexican Government, were inconsistent with the laws of Mexico. Under these circumstances, it appears to us that he cannot claim to hold the Mexican Government responsible for the ill-treatment to which he was subjected by Tamay while acting under Tamay's licence. He chose to deal with the Indian tribe which he found in control of the territory on terms which he never could have obtained if the Mexican dominion then had been effective, and we think that he cannot now turn round and assert that he was entitled to the protection of the Mexican Government while so acting.

Of course a great deal depends upon the precise state of the facts, but, upon the materials before us, we do not think that His Majesty's Government would be justified in treating the allegations of the Mexican Government as unfounded. If Mr. Lewis treated with Tamay and his tribe merely as owners of the land, and did not take the licence in any way in contravention of Mexican law, the case might have another aspect.

If the Mexican Government would agree to some inexpensive form of arbitration, it might be the best way of dealing with the situation which has arisen.

NICARAGUA.

No. 10.

[November 10, 1905.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, September 29, 1905.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list, which relate to a dispute which has arisen between this country and Nicaragua in connection with the turtle fisheries off the Mosquito Coast.

The facts of the controversy are set forth in a Memorandum drawn up in this Office, which is transmitted herewith for your information (Paper A), and from which it will be seen that the Nicaraguan Government Agents in April 1904 seized several schooners and their crews hailing from the Cayman Islands, a dependency of Jamaica. These vessels were engaged in catching turtle in the immediate neighbourhood of a "crawl," or shallow water inclosure for keeping the turtles awaiting shipment, which had been used by the Cayman Islanders for the purpose for thirty years. This "crawl" was situated about 8 miles outside the territorial limit of the two main Mosquito Cays, over which the Nicaraguan Government claim, and actually exercise, jurisdiction. His Majesty's Government have never recognized the sovereignty of Nicaragua over the waters which contain this inclosure, which is commonly known by the fishermen as "Old Crawl." It was thought at the time, however, on the information then available, that the "crawl" was situated within 2 miles of a rock called Sucre Cay, and it was considered by this Department that, for this reason, the "crawl" could not be held to be part of the high seas, but must be within the jurisdiction of that Power, if any, which exercised jurisdiction over Sucre Cay.

Some discussion took place between the two Governments as to the extent of Nicaraguan jurisdiction in those waters, in the course of which the Nicaraguan Government maintained that the Mosquito Banks, where the schooners were seized, had always belonged to Nicaragua, and that under their Civil Code they were entitled to claim as Nicaraguan territory the waters within 1 marine league, or three miles, of Nicaraguan territory, but that their rights of police extended over 4 marine leagues. They were informed that His Majesty's Government could not admit the Nicaraguan claim to exercise jurisdiction over British vessels, for police or any other purposes, outside the ordinary 3-mile limit of territorial waters.

The Nicaraguan Government thereupon expressed the opinion that the best way of deciding the extent of their territorial waters, would be to appoint a Mixed Commission to visit the Mosquito Cays and decide the question in conformity with international law. In March last a Commission of four was accordingly appointed, consisting of two British officers, Captain Tothill, of His Majesty's ship "Diamond," and Mr. Sanguinetti, Commissioner of the Cayman Islands, and of two Nicaraguans; and the Commissioners were instructed to examine the cays and banks constituting the groups known as the Mosquito Cays and Morrison Cays respectively, and to report all relevant facts and particulars, so as to enable the two Governments to determine which of such cays and banks are islands that would confer on Nicaragua jurisdiction over the waters surrounding them for 1 marine league.

In April last the Commissioners furnished their Report, and it was communicated to this Department almost simultaneously by the Admiralty and the Colonial Office. (Papers B and C.)

Since the Report of the Commission was received considerable correspondence (see packet marked D) has taken place between this Department and the Admiralty and the Colonial Office respectively, as the Lords Commissioners pointed out that if "Old Crawl" and Deadman's Bar are plotted on the Admiralty charts according to the latitudes and longitudes given in the Report, it brings those two places within 2½ miles of each other, and not 5 miles apart as stated in the Report.

Subsequent inquiries, however, which have been made by the Governor of Jamaica, have elicited the facts that the distance of 5 miles was actually computed by the Commissioners, whereas the latitudes and longitudes given were not the result of independent observations made by the Commission, but were copied from the Admiralty chart, and that there seems to be some reason to think that the Admiralty chart is inaccurate.

Under these circumstances, Lord Lansdowne proposes to accept and act upon the statement that the distance between "Old Crawl" and Deadman's Bar is 5 miles, and that "Old Crawl," the spot where the seizures took place, is on the high seas.

If in the course of the subsequent diplomatic correspondence with the Nicaraguan Government that Government should take the point that the latitude and longitude given show the intervening distance between the two places to be less than 3 miles, his Lordship would propose to reply that as the findings of the Report are manifestly contradictory, it would be desirable for the Commission to reassemble and inquire anew into the facts relative to these two banks.

The question of fishing in the future around these Mosquito Banks is of great importance to the Cayman Islanders, and it may be necessary for His Majesty's Government ultimately to come to some understanding with the Nicaraguan Government as to the terms on which the islanders may be allowed to make use of the facilities afforded by the Mosquito Cays.

Before doing so, however, it is very desirable for his Lordship to know how much of the fishing grounds must be regarded as within Nicaraguan jurisdiction, and this depends upon the question whether or not the banks subsequently referred to are islands.

Lord Lansdowne would therefore be glad to be furnished with your opinion whether in the light of the facts reported by the Commission, Sucre Cay and Deadman's Bar are, or are not, islands in the sense that they are capable of conferring sovereignty over the adjacent waters within 3 miles.

Different deductions have been drawn from the Report by the Lords Commissioners and Mr. Secretary Lyttelton, and the arguments in favour of each of the competing views will be found in the letters from the Admiralty and the Colonial Office. His Lordship would also be glad if you would express an opinion on the same point with regard to Morrison Cays and Ham Cays.

The Report of the Commission appears to show that Sucre Cay, Deadman's Bar, and Ham Cays are uncovered at normal high tide, but are all liable to be washed over by the sea during gales, and, in two cases, are probably liable to shift at such times. In Morrison Cays the ground is entirely submerged, but the mangrove bushes are permanently above water.

With regard to Sucre Cay, I am also to inclose (Paper E) a letter from the Admiralty dated the 11th January last, containing an interesting report with sketch and plan of that island by His Majesty's ship "Pelorus," though these do not seem quite to tally with the Report of the Commission describing the island as pear-shaped.

A Report by your predecessors (Paper F) dated the 25th March, 1875, mentioning incidentally that land, however small in extent, which is not submerged at ordinary high tides, is an island, is also inclosed.

I am further to express the hope that you will offer such observations of a general nature as you think will be of assistance to His Majesty's Government in dealing with the case.

I have, &c.

Report.

In our opinion Sucre Cay, Deadman's Bar, and Ham Cays must be considered as islands. We know of no test for determining such a question except that laid down by our predecessors in their Report of the 25th March, 1875, viz., whether the land is submerged or not at ordinary high tide, and we do not think it would be advisable in any event to depart from this view, which was acted upon in the case of islands in the South Pacific Ocean. As regards Morrison Cays, applying the same test, they would not be considered islands, but it may possibly not be worth while to draw any distinction.

There remains, of course, the further question as to whether the Nicaraguan Government can successfully claim sovereignty over these cays, and upon this point we are not in a position, upon the materials before us, to offer any opinion.

It is, we think, well worthy of consideration whether, having regard to the difficulty of defining the territorial limits of Nicaragua, it might not be better to attempt to have satisfactory conditions of fishing laid down in concert with the Nicaraguan Government.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, October 19, 1904.

I HAVE the honour to transmit to you herewith, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, the papers noted in the accompanying list, relative to the question of the steps to be taken to prevent foreign interference with the rights enjoyed by the tribes on the Arabian Coast of the Persian Gulf in the pearl fisheries.

It will be observed, from the India Office letter of the 30th June (Annex A), that the Government of India have called the attention of His Majesty's Government to the fact that, by the steps they have consistently taken for more than a century to maintain the maritime peace of the Persian Gulf, they have deprived the Arab Chiefs on the coast of the means of forcibly protecting their interests in the pearl fisheries, and that they therefore feel themselves to be under an obligation to defend those rights in so far as they can reasonably be substantiated.

They cite instances in the past in which they have successfully intervened to prevent the intrusion both of foreigners, by diplomatic means, and of British subjects.

They recognize, however, that the position is difficult, both in regard to British subjects and from the point of view of international law. They therefore desire to ascertain the extent to which they may be authorized to intervene, should the necessity arise.

The material facts may be stated as follows:—

1. The pearl fishery banks lie off the Arabian Coast of the Persian Gulf, and off the coast of Bahrein. They extend, as shown on the charts (Annex B) inclosed with the Government of India's letter, from Um-ul-Kawain to near the head of the Gulf. His Majesty's Government have identical Agreements (Annex C) with the Arab Chiefs of Raz-el-Khaimah, Um-ul-Kawain, Ajman, Shargah, Debai, Abu Dhabbi, and Bahrein, by which the Chiefs have practically surrendered their foreign relations into the hands of the British Government. The territory of these Chiefs comprises the Arabian Coast of the Gulf off which the pearl banks lie up to the Island of Bahrein, with the exception of the promontory of El Katr, with whose Chief the question of making a similar Agreement is now under the consideration of His Majesty's Government. North of Bahrein, the sovereignty over the Arabian shore of the Gulf belongs to the Sultan of Turkey, with the exception of the territory of the Sheikh of Koweit, who has special relations with His Majesty's Government.

2. Apparently all the tribes fish for pearls wherever they are to be found, and no tribe has exercised a right excluding the other tribes from any part of the fishery.

3. Only members of the tribes have hitherto fished for pearls in these waters.

4.—(a.) Portions of some of the pearl banks lie within the 3-mile territorial limit.

(b.) Some of the banks extend from within the 3-mile limit outwards for several miles.

(c.) Some of the banks are entirely outside the 3-mile limit.

In all these cases the tribes have exercised an exclusive and concurrent right of fishing for pearls.

5. The tribes have not fished for pearls in the deep waters off the banks, having no appliances for deep-water fishing. It is apprehended that dredging for pearls in such deep waters would materially injure the pearl fishery on the banks; and it is desired, if possible, to prevent dredging in such deep waters.

6. The action to be taken for the protection of the pearl fishery would appear to depend on (1) the legal right of the tribes to a monopoly; and (2) the power of the British Government to act on their behalf in maintaining that monopoly. It is conceived that some precise delegation of authority to the British Government to act on behalf of the tribes in this matter would be necessary. It must be added that none of the tribes have any judicial system or Courts of Law for dealing with trespassers or trespassing boats.

A selection of confidential correspondence respecting the Ceylon Pearl Fisheries, which took place in 1891-1892 (Annex D), and copies of the Argument (Annex E) and Counter-Case (Annex F) of Her late Majesty's Government in the Behring Sea Arbitration (certain passages in which are specially marked) are inclosed herewith for your information.

I am to request that you will take the papers transmitted herewith into your consideration, and that you will favour Lord Lansdowne with your opinion—

1. As to the legal rights of the tribes within, as also without, the 3-mile territorial limit;

2. As to the procedure to be followed in expelling interlopers and dealing with their boats and fishing appliances.

Report.

1. The tribes have a right to the exclusive use of the pearl fisheries within the 3-mile limit and in any other waters which may justly be considered territorial.

As regards the fisheries beyond territorial waters, we think that a distinction must be drawn between the banks where the tribes have practised pearl fishing and the deep waters in which no such fishery has been carried on by them.

As regards the pearl banks, we think that, as a matter of international law, they are capable of being the property of the tribes to the exclusion of all other nations. In addition to the passage cited from Vattel, reference may be made to Puffendorf's treatise "De Jure Naturæ et gentium," Book IV, Chapter V, section 7, and to the recent work of Professor Westlake, "International Law," Part I, Chapter 9, at pp. 186 and 187, and the case of the protection of the Ceylon pearl banks is a striking illustration of the assertion of this right in practice. Whether such rights, in fact, exist with regard to these particular pearl banks in the Persian Gulf is a question the answer to which cannot be given with any certainty, as it depends on the evidence available of historical facts with reference to the enjoyment of these fisheries by the tribes and the exclusion of others from them. As far as we can judge, upon the materials before us, we think that there are grounds for asserting the existence of such an exclusive right, and we do not think that, in point of law, the fact that the enjoyment was by the tribes in common would prevent the acquisition of the right in question. Having regard to the relations of His Majesty's Government with the tribes on the west shore of the Persian Gulf, we think that the existence of this exclusive right may be properly maintained on their behalf by His Majesty's Government.

With regard to the deep waters in which pearl fishing has not been carried on by the tribes, we think the case is different. There is here no defined area at the bottom of the sea over which the right of fishing has been exercised to the exclusion of other nations, as there is some ground for saying was the case with regard to the pearl banks. We cannot see that the right claimed by the tribes to exclude other nations from these deeper waters could be asserted with any reasonable chance of success.

2. Having regard to the importance of protecting the deeper waters, and to the fact that for the reasons above indicated it cannot be regarded as certain that the right even to the pearl banks could be established to the satisfaction of any international Tribunal, we think that it would be preferable to discourage foreign interference by refusing supplies, &c., as suggested in the papers before us. If such measures prove inadequate it may be necessary, having obtained the authority of the Chiefs for this purpose, to compel the removal of vessels engaged in fishing on the pearl banks. Of course, measures of this kind must be taken with caution, as international complications might result from any precipitate action. It might also be practicable—whether it should be done or not is a matter of policy—to raise the question in a form suitable for decision by The Hague Tribunal. Fishing within the territorial waters may, of course, be prevented.

Generally, we desire to add that, having regard to the importance of the question to the tribes, and the fact that we cannot be certain of establishing the right claimed, it is probably desirable that the fishing by foreigners should, if possible, be indirectly stopped without raising the question internationally.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, June 20, 1905.

"Hipsang" sunk by Russians.
As to claim on account of being a
Prize Court.

I AM directed by the Marquess of Lansdowne to transmit to you the papers mentioned in the accompanying list, with respect to a claim for compensation against the Russian Government made by the owners of the British steam-ship "Hipsang," which was sunk by a Russian torpedo-boat near Pigeon Bay on the 16th July, 1904.

You will observe from the correspondence that the "Hipsang," a British vessel owned by the Indo-China Steam Navigation Company, left Newchwang on the 15th July, 1904, on a voyage to Chefoo, and, on the following morning, while off Pigeon Bay, in clear weather, and with her lights burning, was, without being previously signalled to stop, suddenly fired at by a Russian destroyer. The "Hipsang" at once stopped and hoisted the British merchant flag, but the Russian vessel, nevertheless, continued to fire, killing and wounding several Chinese on board the "Hipsang," and finally sank her with a torpedo.

His Majesty's Government regarded the proceeding as entirely unjustifiable, and His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg was instructed on the 16th August (see Nos. 32 and 33 of Confidential Print) to inform the Russian Government that His Majesty's Government considered the destruction of the "Hipsang" to be an act which was wholly unwarranted, and that it would be their duty to claim full compensation. A representation in this sense was accordingly made to the Russian Government by Sir Charles Hardinge on the 29th August, 1904 (Print No. 42).

The claim for compensation was drawn up by the owners of the "Hipsang," amounting to 47,679l. 2s. 1d., and, after being carefully supervised in this Department, was presented to the Russian Government by His Majesty's Ambassador on the 12th March last (Print, Nos. 63 and 64). Count Lamsdorff, replied on the 30th March (Print No. 66) that a Special Commission had been appointed to consider the claim, and, on the 31st ultimo, informed Sir C. Hardinge that the Commission of Inquiry had unanimously decided that there were not sufficient grounds to distinguish the case of the sinking of the "Hipsang" from the general category of prize cases, and that, therefore, the owners of the ship must address their claim to the proper port Tribunal.

Lord Lansdowne is, however, inclined to the opinion that the case is not of a kind with which Prize Courts are concerned, and his Lordship thinks that the owners of the "Hipsang" are reasonably entitled to expect His Majesty's Government to secure for them direct consideration of their claim at the hands of the Government of the offending ship without their being put to the trouble and expense of first ascertaining what Prize Court, if any, will admit jurisdiction, and then endeavouring to establish to the satisfaction of the Court the liability of the Russian Government and the details of their own losses.

It appears to the Secretary of State that the sphere of a Prize Court is the determination of cases where the belligerent Government comes into direct relations with individuals who are subjects of another, and a neutral State: cases where the individual has been committing some act—e.g., carrying contraband—which, by the practice of nations, the belligerent State is entitled to prevent, and where the neutral Government is not concerned. On the other hand, the protection of its subjects from belligerent outrage is a matter which very closely concerns the neutral State, and any claim put forward on account of such a proceeding becomes the claim of the neutral State, and should be dealt with directly between the two Governments concerned.

The Russian Government would, of course, be entitled themselves to refer the case to the Judges of a Prize or other Court or to a Commission, for the details to be investigated, especially if they admitted liability, or to create a Commission and to request that all future claims should be laid before it, but their action in the case of the "Hipsang" appears to Lord Lansdowne to amount to a refusal to entertain the claim at all diplomatically, and his Lordship does not consider that there is any justification for such a course.

The Secretary of State therefore proposes to instruct His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg to send back the claim to the Russian Government, with an intimation that His Majesty's Government see no reason for putting the owners of the vessel to the expense and delay of taking proceedings in a Prize Court, and consider that the claim should be dealt with diplomatically.

Before taking this step, however, Lord Lansdowne would be glad if you will take the papers into your consideration, and favour his Lordship with your opinion as to whether he is correct in taking the view that the difference between this case and an ordinary case of interference with a neutral vessel suspected of carrying contraband, is really one of essence, and not merely of degree, and, if so, whether His Majesty's Government are justified in adopting the course above proposed.

His Lordship would further be glad to be furnished with any general observations which you may be good enough to offer for his assistance in dealing with the case.

I have, &c.

Report.

We agree with your Lordship's view that the difference between this case and an ordinary case of interference with a neutral vessel suspected of carrying contraband is one of essence and not of degree.

There is in our opinion no proper ground for asking the owners of the "Hipsang" to take proceedings in a Prize Court, nor do we see what question arising in the case could or ought properly to be referred to such a Court. We think, therefore, that His Majesty's Government are justified in adopting the course suggested.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 6, 1905.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list, which relate to the sinking of the British merchant-vessels "St. Kilda" and "Ikhona" by the Russian cruisers "Dnieper" and "Terek."

The material facts in connection with the sinking of these vessels are set forth in the annexed Memorandum marked (A and B).

I am to state that, in his Lordship's opinion, the sinking of the "St. Kilda" and "Ikhona," following upon the cases of the "Knight Commander" and "Hipsang," which took place last year, furnishes His Majesty's Government with the strongest grounds for remonstrance, more especially in view of the assurance given by Count Lamsdorff in August last that no more British merchant-vessels would be sunk by the public ships of Russia.

It will be seen from the correspondence (Papers (C) to (I) inclusive) that the matter has already formed the subject of communication between His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg and Count Lamsdorff, and that it appears that the Russian Government still reserves in principle the right in certain special circumstances to sink neutral vessels, holding that the question of compensation for such action is one which would follow the decision of a Prize Court in favour of the owners of the vessels.

As in the case of the "Hipsang," in regard to which you favoured his Lordship with a Report on the 29th ultimo (Paper (J)), I am to state that, in his Lordship's view, the difference between the case of the "St. Kilda" and the "Ikhona" and an ordinary case of interference with a neutral vessel suspected of carrying contraband is one of essence and not of degree, and that His Majesty's Government would not be justified in leaving the owners of these vessels, who have suffered such serious loss, to seek redress in a Prize Court which may or may not award them compensation.

His Lordship has accordingly caused the annexed instructions to His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg to be prepared (Paper (K)), requesting his Excellency to address a representation in the matter to the Russian Government, and to inform them that the claims of the parties concerned will be presented to them in due course, irrespective of any decision which may be arrived at by a Prize Court at Libau or elsewhere in regard to the action of the "Dnieper" and the "Terek."

I have the honour to request that you will take into your consideration the papers referred to herein, as well as those also inclosed for convenience of reference, and that you will, at your earliest possible convenience, favour his Lordship with your opinion whether in the circumstances the terms of the proposed instructions to Sir C. Hardinge are right and proper, or whether, and if so in what respects, they can with advantage be modified or amended.

Draft despatch from the Marquess of Lansdowne to Sir C. Hardinge.

(No. . . Treaty.)
Sir,

Foreign Office, July . . . 1905.

I HAVE received your Excellency's despatches No. 68, Treaty, of the 26th, and No. 71, Treaty, of the 28th ultimo, in which you inform me of the communications which have passed between yourself and Count Lamsdorff respecting the sinking by the Russian cruisers "Dnieper" and "Terek," of the British steam-ships "St. Kilda" and "Ikhona" respectively.

* In erased type and italics.

In the second of these despatches your Excellency has, to a great extent, anticipated the instructions I am now addressing to you, and the language which you held in conversation with Count Lamsdorff correctly expresses the views of His Majesty's Government, and meets with their entire approval.

I observe that Count Lamsdorff, in his note of the 25th ultimo, refers to Professor Holland as upholding the right of a belligerent to destroy neutral prizes, and cites, in support of his argument, an article from the "Revue de Droit International," No. 3, 1905. This article is a French translation of a paper by Professor Holland which recently appeared in "The Proceedings of British Academy," of which institution he is a Fellow. A copy of this pamphlet is inclosed, together with a copy of a letter which appeared in the "Times" newspaper of the 1st instant from the Professor on the subject.*

It will be apparent from a perusal of these publications that although the naval instructions of certain of the Powers do contemplate in very exceptional circumstances the destruction of neutral merchant vessels—a fact which His Majesty's Government have never disputed—Professor Holland regards such a proceeding as greatly to be deprecated, and has doubts whether even overwhelming necessity would be sufficient to justify it.

But whatever view any independent writer may take on the subject is a matter of secondary consideration. Professor Holland is undoubtedly a theoretical jurist of eminence and reputation, whose opinions are entitled to every respect. His Majesty's Government are, however, in no way bound by them. Their views on the subject of destroying neutral prizes were very fully set out in the dispatch which I addressed to your Excellency on the 10th of August last, and they see no grounds for altering or modifying the opinion they then expressed, in support of which many eminent authorities, both British and foreign, were cited. His Majesty's Government conceive that these regrettable incidents, which have provoked so much irritation in this country, must be considered and dealt with from the stand-point of the special circumstances attending them, to which it is necessary briefly to refer.

In the month of August last, Count Lamsdorff gave your Excellency a very categorical and positive assurance, on the faith of which the Prime Minister felt warranted in publicly expressing himself as convinced that no more British merchant-ships would be sunk by the public ships of Russia. Upon that assurance His Majesty's Government placed such reliance that, although they were at the time seriously contemplating the adoption of effective measures to prevent the recurrence of such incidents, they abandoned the idea of taking such measures. His Majesty's Government do not for a moment suggest that Count Lamsdorff's assurance was given otherwise than in absolute good faith, and they readily admit that, for the best part of a year, the pledge has been honourably fulfilled, and that no act has been committed against British vessels by the Russian fleet to which exception could properly be taken on the ground of its being in contravention of that assurance. But whether it is due to the instructions which the Russian Admiralty sent last year to their naval Commanders having been cancelled, or not received by certain cruisers, or, if received, disregarded, the fact remains that on the 5th ultimo, the British steam-ship "St. Kilda" was sunk by the "Dnieper," while the British steam-ship "Ikhona" was sunk on the same day by the "Terek." This intelligence was naturally received both by His Majesty's Government and by the commercial and shipping community of this country with feelings of profound astonishment and concern.

The "St. Kilda" was bound from Hong Kong to Japan with a cargo, consisting for the most part of rice, as well as of some sugar, cotton, jute, and other general merchandize.

The "Ikhona" was bound from Rangoon to Yokohama also with a cargo of rice. According to the statement of the master of the last-named vessel, the Commander of the "Terek" informed him that, having a cargo of rice and wheat on board, the vessel must be destroyed, and accordingly after an unsuccessful attempt to blow her up with dynamite, the "Terek" fired at her till she sank. The contraband character of provisions, such as these vessels carried, has been admitted both by the Russian Government as well as by its highest Prize Court, the Supreme Admiralty Council, to depend upon whether they are ultimately destined for the enemy's forces, or for harmless purposes in the enemy country, a matter which a Prize Court alone could determine with anything approaching to certainty. But, this notwithstanding, the Commander of this Russian cruiser constituted himself the sole arbiter, and destroyed the vessel. Such a proceeding can only be characterized as intolerable, and seems, moreover, to be wholly unwarrantable by the terms of the Russian Naval Regulations themselves.

In all these circumstances, and in view of the fact that the assurances given by Count Lamsdorff have been rendered not only nugatory, but misleading, by the action of these two cruisers, His Majesty's Government do not feel justified in leaving the owners of the British vessels—who have suffered such serious loss—to seek redress in a Prize Court, which may or may not award them compensation. Such a course—even if the circumstances warranted it—only implies, as recent events have unfortunately proved, further delays and expense.

As soon, therefore, as the claims of the parties concerned have been formulated and examined, your Excellency will be instructed to present them to the Russian Government, and to press for their settlement, irrespective of any decision which a Prize Court at Libau or elsewhere, may arrive at with regard to the action of the "Dnieper" and "Terek."

Your Excellency will be good enough to communicate the substance of this despatch to Count Lamsdorff, and—if you think well—to furnish him with a copy of it.

RUSSIA.

No. 14.

[November 8, 1905.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 31, 1905.

Russo-Japanese war. Claims for capture, destruction, &c., of vessels during.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit, for your consideration, the papers noted in the accompanying list, respecting claims pending against the Russian Government in respect of various British vessels captured, sunk, or otherwise destroyed by the public ships of Russia in the course of the war between that country and Japan.

The Russian Government appear to hold the view that in all these cases the parties interested, if they desire to obtain compensation for their losses, must initiate proceedings in the Russian Prize Courts in the manner provided in Article 88 of their Prize Law Regulations, of which a copy is inclosed (Paper A).

Lord Lansdowne, on the other hand, has been advised that where the claims have arisen from proceedings on the part of the Russian naval officers which are not justified by the ordinary rules of international law, and which constitute an unwarrantable interference with neutral shipping, or where the Prize Court which, under ordinary circumstances, would have jurisdiction over the case has been rendered unavailable, and the Russian Government decline to indicate another in its place, the claims should be dealt with diplomatically. In the former class of cases His Majesty's Government are, to a certain extent, pledged to the parties interested to support their claims irrespective of the decisions of the Russian Prize Courts.

Sir C. Hardinge, His Britannic Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg, has, however, now informed the Secretary of State that he sees little probability that the attempts to get the claims settled through the diplomatic channel will be successful, and has urged that the ordinary rule should be observed in these cases, and that the parties should be informed that they must endeavour to secure compensation for themselves through the Prize Court and exhaust their legal remedies before the claims are made the subject of further diplomatic negotiation. He has also pointed out that other Governments seem to be following this course, and that His Majesty's Government stand alone in their attempt to secure a direct settlement of the claims.

The papers in connection with two of the cases, the "Allanton" and the "Oldhamia," were recently, by Lord Lansdowne's directions, submitted unofficially to the Solicitor-General, as it was thought that immediate instructions must be sent to St. Petersburg. As it has been found possible to suspend all action in connection with the claims, Lord Lansdowne now feels that it is desirable that the papers in connection with all the claims should be submitted to you, and that he should ask to be furnished with your opinion on the general principles involved.

It will be convenient, in the first place, to state briefly the present position of the various cases now pending in regard to which Lord Lansdowne is anxious to be favoured with your views.

The "Allanton."

This vessel, which is the property of Mr. W. R. Rea, of Belfast, was seized in June 1904, on her voyage from Muroran, in Hokkaido (North Japan), with a cargo of bunker coal for Singapore. The steamer was taken to Vladivostock, where, according to the master, an effort was made to purchase her. The Russian authorities also discharged a portion of the coal cargo before the decision of the Prize Court. Sir C. Hardinge, on making representations to the Russian Government, was informed that this was done in order to ascertain whether the "Allanton" contained any other cargo. The ship and cargo were condemned by the Vladivostock Prize Court on the 28th June, 1904.

An Appeal was brought against this decision, and was heard in October last at St. Petersburg.

The Supreme Prize Court decided as follows on the 22nd October:—

1. To recognize the steamer "Allanton" and her cargo as not subject to confiscation, and to return the steamer and the cargo to their owners;

RUSSIA.

2. To recognize that the steamer "Allanton" and her cargo had been detained on sufficient grounds and with the observance of established rules; and
3. That the decision of the Prize Court of the port of Vladivostock shall be annulled as regards the confiscation of the said steamer and cargo.

(The full texts of the judgments of both Courts are inclosed in packet (B).)

The owners of the "Allanton" thereupon sent a claim to the Foreign Office amounting to 39,000*l.* Upon this it was pointed out to them that, under paragraph 88 of the Russian Regulations, claims for compensation should be presented to a Port Prize Court. This they admitted, but observed that under paragraph 30 of the same Regulations "a special indemnity may be awarded to the original owner for losses caused by the seizure of the property when it is recognized that the property was seized without sufficient reason," but that, inasmuch as the Supreme Court had decided that the "Allanton" had, in fact, been detained on sufficient grounds, they were precluded from all chance of recovering a claim through a Port Prize Court, any proceedings in which were foredoomed to failure, and they therefore urged that their claim should be presented diplomatically.

The claim was therefore carefully scrutinized with the aid of a shipping expert, reduced by about 20,000*l.*, and forwarded to Sir C. Hardinge in March last, with instructions to present it to Russian Government and press for its early settlement.

Sir Charles Hardinge, who had meanwhile consulted with M. Scheffel, the advocate who had represented the owners of the "Allanton" before the Court of Appeal, still remained of opinion that the legal remedy should be employed first. He maintained that even if Mr. Rea was precluded from obtaining compensation for the detention of the vessel for the period between the date of capture and the hearing of the Vladivostock Court, such an argument could not hold good for the further period of detention which terminated with the release of the ship. He thought this argument should be worked up and presented to a Port Prize Court, and if ignored or disputed by that Court, then would come the proper time for diplomatic intervention.

When the advance of the Japanese forces rendered it impossible for Prize Court proceedings to be commenced at Vladivostock, an effort was made to get the Russian Government to nominate some other Tribunal, but this they declined to do, although Count Lamsdorff admitted that Vladivostock was unavailable, but the Government maintained that only the Prize Courts themselves could determine questions of their own jurisdiction and competency.

Consequently, as the Russian Government would not definitely indicate any Court that was clearly competent and available to entertain the claims of the owner of the "Allanton," Sir Charles Hardinge was instructed to present the claim of 18,000*l.* odd to the Russian Government and to request that it might be dealt with forthwith.

In pursuance of these instructions, he has drafted a note for presentation to the Russian Government which is inclosed in his despatch No. 103, Treaty, of the 9th August (see packet (B)).

His Excellency, however, urges that the same course should be followed by the "Allanton" claimants as that adopted in the case of the German vessel, the "Thea," and states that the owners of that vessel are about to commence proceedings at Libau to recover compensation.

The German steam-ship "Thea" was sunk on the 25th July, 1904, by the Russian cruiser squadron. The Prize Court at Vladivostock examined the case on the 11th August, and found both ship and cargo a lawful prize, apparently on the ground that she had been chartered on the 12th March for nine months by the Japanese "Hakoi Sanyo Hossi" Company, and had thus lost her neutral character, while the cargo, consisting of fish, fat, and oil, represented every property on board a ship which had lost her neutral character, and was therefore liable to confiscation.

On the 3rd December last Sir C. Hardinge telegraphed that the appeal against this sentence had been heard that day, and the sentence annulled. No motives were given, but the apparent reason was "question as to cargo."

His Excellency added that the question of right to sink was not raised.

Sir C. Hardinge reported on the 18th June last that the German Ambassador at St. Petersburg had lodged the owners' claim at the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, and had been officially informed that the owners must present the claim to the proper Prize Court. The Ministry suggested that as it was practically impossible to present the claim at Vladivostock the owners should address themselves to the Prize Court at

Libau. In the event of the Prize Court declaring its incompetency the owners would then be justified in demanding that the claim should be decided by the Supreme Prize Court in St. Petersburg.

It is, however, to be observed that as the Supreme Court at St. Petersburg annulled the finding of the Vladivostock Court in the case of the "Thea," the chances of a successful issue in any action that may be instituted before the Libau Court for compensation are greater than they would be in the cases of the "Allanton" and "Calchas" where the Supreme Court have held that the capture, &c., was justified.

The Solicitor-General has, however, semi-officially, expressed the opinion that, on the whole, the course advocated by Sir Charles Hardinge as regards the "Allanton" claims may be adopted.

In addition to the claims of the owners of the "Allanton" this Department has been requested by representatives of the Seamen's and Firemen's Union, on behalf of the crew, and by the Merchant Service Guild on behalf of the captain and officers, to put forward certain claims on account of the hardships and risks incurred by them.

If it is ultimately decided to present the larger claims of the owners to a Prize Court the question will arise whether claims on behalf of the officers and crew based on the hardships they endured and the risks they were exposed to, and not on any actual losses, can be brought within the terms of Article 88.

Further details with regard to this portion of the "Allanton" claim will be found in the papers in packet (C).

The "Calchas."

This vessel is one of Messrs. Holt's steamers, valued at about 100,000*l.*, and was captured by the Vladivostock squadron about the 27th July, 1904. She was on a voyage from Tacoma and Victoria to Japan. She had on board about 1,000*l.* worth of flour consigned to a British firm at Kobé, some timber which the Court held was for shipbuilding, and machinery. The chief hardship of this case is that she was not tried at Vladivostock until the 15th September, forty-nine days at least after her capture, and was, in the interval, taken by the Russian officer in charge to Korsakowsky in the Island of Saghalien. Here 2,000 bags of flour were, by order of Admiral Skrydloff, discharged and left there with the consent of the captain, who was furnished with a receipt. The "Calchas" did not reach Vladivostock until the 8th August.

The Judges of the Prize Court at that port confiscated the cargo intended for Japanese ports, consisting of 13,300 sacks of flour, 36 bales of cotton, and 97 pieces of rough timber. The cargo consigned to neutral ports—in quantity 3,423,413 lbs. and 41,610 cubic feet—was ordered to be released at once.

With regard to seventy pieces of machinery on board, the Prize Court decided that they were not to be regarded as destined for warlike purposes until the expiration of three months in which the owners might appeal.

The ship was not condemned, but her release was refused till the time had expired (one month) to allow the captor to appeal. The case has formed unfavourable comparison with that of the "Arabia," a German vessel with a similar cargo, also captured, but released in twelve days. The captor appealed against the non-condemnation of the "Calchas" on the ground that she carried enemy despatches. The ship accordingly could not be released without bail. Though undoubtedly a very hard case, there was just sufficient technical justification for the vessel's detention to make it difficult for His Majesty's Government to accede to the request of the owners and demand its unconditional release. From reports received by the owners from the captain, it is believed that the Russian authorities really wished to purchase the vessel at their own price to convert her into a transport. Bail was, however, ultimately accepted by the Russian Government and the vessel released. Appeals were lodged with regard to the condemned cargo of flour. These appeals, together with that in the case of the ship, were heard before the Supreme Admiralty Council at St. Petersburg.

The vessel was released on appeal (May 1905), but her arrest and detention were justified by Court. The flour was freed, but the cotton and timber confiscated, the former on the ground that Japanese gun-cotton works existed in the neighbourhood of the port of consignment. The owners notified to the Foreign Office that a claim for compensation would be presented. The value of the shipment of flour was recovered by its owners. A claim of Mr. P. G. McKinnon, in respect of some minting machinery, has been presented to the Russian Government, but has been returned within the last few days with an intimation that he should present a petition "to the competent Prize Court" (see Sir C. Hardinge's No. 107, Treaty, August 21, 1905). The owners of the vessel have formulated a claim for detention amounting to 24,421*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum until payment. It has been examined, and Sir Charles Hardinge was about to be instructed to present it to the Russian Government. In consequence, however, of the views set out in his despatch No. 106, Treaty, of the 12th August (see "Oldhamia" case) action has for the moment been suspended.

It will be observed that Sir Charles Hardinge expresses the opinion that if he does present the claim, the Russian Government will be certain to reply that it must be pursued in a Prize Court. On the other hand, the same considerations are present in this case as in that of the "Allanton," that is to say, the Vladivostock Prize Court is not available, and the Russian Government have not designated any other Court as the one in which such claims should be brought, and as the Supreme Court have held the seizure to be justifiable, there is little hope of a Port Prize Court entertaining the claim.

The judgment of the Vladivostock Prize Court as well as that of the Supreme Court, a Memorandum on the early history of the case of the "Calchas," to which is attached certain public statements by His Majesty's Ministers, and the more recent papers, including the claim on behalf of Mr. Mackinnon, will be found in Packet (D).

The "Cilurnum."

This vessel, the property of a Newcastle ship-owner, was proceeding from Shanghai to Kobé in June last with a cargo of beans, cotton, and antimony. She was stopped by the Russian cruiser "Rion" (formerly the Volunteer fleet ship "Smolensk") on the 3rd June, 1905, and the captain of the latter vessel threw overboard, for the purposes of destruction, such cargo on board the "Cilurnum," as he considered to be contraband, viz., 130 bales of cotton.

The papers are annexed (Packet E), and especial attention is drawn to Sir C. Hardinge's despatch No. 100 of the 8th August and the Minutes thereon. It will be noticed that by sending the papers to the President of the Libau Prize Court, the Russian Government must hold a prima facie opinion that the Port Prize Court at that place is competent to deal with it.

The "Hipsang."

This case has already been before you on a previous occasion. The vessel was the property of the Indo-China Steam Navigation Company, and was shelled, torpedoed, and sunk by the Russian destroyer No. 7 on the 16th July, 1904.

His Majesty's Government instructed Sir C. Hardinge on the 16th August, 1904, to call the attention of the Russian Government to a statement of the circumstances attending the sinking of the vessel, which had been furnished by the Indo-China Steam Navigation Company, and to inform them that, in the event of the telegraphic account being confirmed, His Majesty's Government could only regard her destruction as an act which was wholly unwarranted by the circumstances, and would submit such claims as might seem proper in due course. A claim for 47,679*l.* was accordingly presented to the Russian Government on the 12th March, 1905, and was referred by the latter to a Special Commission.

The Russian Commission decided that the case was one for a Prize Court (Vladivostock), and returned all the papers to His Majesty's Ambassador on the 31st May, 1905. His Majesty's Government contended that it was not a case for a Prize Court—there being no charge whatever against the vessel—and proposed to send back all the papers to the Russian Government and request the settlement of the claim. The Law Officers were consulted, and concurred, and a despatch was sent to Sir C. Hardinge on the 11th July, who has since again presented the claim with an expression of the views of His Majesty's Government. The last note which Sir C. Hardinge addressed to the Russian Government will be found in his Excellency's despatch No. 86, Treaty, of the 16th July. The Russian Government, as will be seen from Sir C. Hardinge's telegram of the 10th August and from his despatch No. 104 of the same date, are in no wise convinced by the arguments advanced by His Majesty's Government, and maintain that the matter must be brought before a Prize Court. The papers referred to above are inclosed (Packet F). Sir C. Hardinge has throughout held the view that this case, unlike others, was entirely one for settlement between the two Governments.

The "Oldhamia."

The managing owners of this vessel are Messrs. Sivewright, Bacon, and Co., of Manchester. The vessel was bound from New York to Hong Kong with a cargo of case oil, shipped by the Standard Oil Company of America. The cargo was, however, destined for Japanese ports, at which it was to be discharged en route.

The vessel was seized by the Russian cruiser "Oleg" on the 18th May; all the officers and the whole of the crew were transferred to Russian ships, and a prize crew took entire possession of the vessel, which was ordered to Vladivostock, escorted by the converted cruisers "Kuban" and "Terek."

The captain and three men were captured by the Japanese on board the Russian hospital ship "Orel" and released, and the remaining twenty-nine were subsequently landed at Swatow by a coasting steamer to which they had been transferred.

Nothing was heard as to the fate of the vessel until the 20th July, when information was received from His Majesty's Minister at Tôkiô that she had been wrecked off Iterup Island (Kurile Islands) and burnt by the prize crew.

On the 29th July Sir C. Hardinge forwarded a communication from the Russian Government, giving particulars of the transfer of the officers and crew of the "Oldhamia" after her seizure. The communication added that the vessel's papers were on board the Russian cruiser "Oleg," at present interned at Manila.

Lord Lansdowne was advised that the facts contained in the master's statement (see inclosure in Sir C. MacDonald's No. 33, Treaty, June 10, 1905) showed an intention on the part of the Russians to appropriate the vessel immediately and not to take her into port for the purposes of adjudication, and that therefore the claim of the owners could be dealt with diplomatically.

Sir C. Hardinge has reported that arrangements are being made for the claim of the American owners of the cargo to be dealt with in a Prize Court, and he has urged upon the Secretary of State the advisability of making the owners of the vessel put forward their claim in the same way and of declining to present the claim diplomatically until efforts have been made to secure adequate compensation through the Prize Court.

These views were set out in a semi-official letter to the head of the Treaty Department in this Office, and were submitted unofficially to the Solicitor-General, who was disposed to agree with Sir Charles Hardinge.

A further despatch has now been received (No. 106, Treaty, of the 12th August), in which the view is again most strongly pressed that His Majesty's Government would not be well-advised to deal with this case at present through the diplomatic channel.

The papers above referred to are inclosed in packet (G).

The "St. Kilda" and the "Ikhona."

The "St. Kilda," the property of Messrs. Rankin, Gilmour, and Co., was bound from Hong Kong to Japanese ports with a cargo of sugar, rice (38,000 bags), rape cake, copra, cotton, and other general merchandize; she was sunk by the "Dnieper" (late "Petersbourg") in the China Sea about the 5th June, 1905. The Chinese crew and mails were transferred to the Dutch steamer "Flores" and landed at Singapore. The European officers and engineers were detained on board the "Dnieper" until her arrival at Port Saïd, when they were handed over to the Senior British Naval Officer.

The claim of the owners of the vessel has been received and amounts to 36,950*l.*, and those on behalf of the charterers, the native crew, and the shippers amount to about 23,000*l.*

Messrs. Parker, Garrett, and Co. have notified that the claim in respect of the cargo is being prepared, and they were told on the 25th July that it will be supported by His Majesty's Government.

It was proposed to send in the owners' claim at once without waiting for those in respect of the cargo, which would have formed the subject of a further claim.

From later information received from Hong Kong and Singapore, through the Colonial Office on the 14th July, it appears that the commander of the "Dnieper," in handing over mails (seventy-eight bags and one case of mails) to the Dutch steamer "Flores" (which landed them at Singapore, whence they were returned to Hong Kong), stated that they were unaccompanied by any documents (i.e., waybill, &c.), and that seventy-three bags and one case had been examined and resealed.

We have now learnt (31st July) from the Colonial Office, whom we asked to make inquiries on the 26th July, that in one of these bags was a registered letter addressed to the Japanese Foreign Office from Hong Kong, which has been abstracted by the commander of the "Dnieper," and is presumably now in the possession of the Russian Government.

The "Ikhona" is the property of the British-India Steam Navigation Company, and was bound to Yokohama with rice and mails from Rangoon. She was sunk while on the voyage by the Russian auxiliary cruiser "Terek" (late the "Columbia," of the Hamburg-American Line) on the 5th June, 1905. This cruiser is now interned at Batavia. The officers and crew of the "Ikhona" were landed at Singapore from the Dutch steamer "Perlak," to which they had been transferred.

No claim has as yet been received, but the owners have given notice that one will be put forward, and Messrs. Waltons, Johnson, and Co. stated on the 30th June that the Insurance Companies interested in the cargo would also make a claim, and were told on the 5th July that it should be sent to the Foreign Office for examination.

On the 16th and 26th June telegraphic instructions were addressed to Sir C. Hardinge respecting the cases of the "St. Kilda" and "Ikhona" respectively. In the first message his Excellency was instructed to point out the irritation which the sinking of the "St. Kilda" had produced in this country, and that this act was in direct contravention of the specific assurances given by Count Lamsdorff in August 1904 that no more neutral vessels would be sunk. His Majesty's Government expressed the hope that the Russian Government would share their regret at the incident, would disavow the action of the "Dnieper," undertake to provide compensation and to secure British shipping against such treatment in the future, and further asked that the Russian Commander should be instructed, on his arrival at Port Saïd, to hand over the officers of the "St. Kilda," and to tender suitable expressions of regret and an assurance that no further acts of the kind would be committed by his vessel. His Majesty's Government further offered to send cruisers to deliver the message.

In the second message Sir C. Hardinge was instructed to impress upon Count Lamsdorff the urgent necessity of dealing promptly with the case of the "Ikhona" on the lines indicated in respect of the "St. Kilda," and to say that, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, the sinking of the "Ikhona" greatly aggravated the serious situation already created.

On the 28th June Sir C. Hardinge reported that he had discussed the whole question of the sinking of these two ships with Count Lamsdorff. The latter pleaded that the whole matter rested with the Ministry of Marine, the Ministry for Foreign Affairs merely acting as a channel of communication. He also informed Sir C. Hardinge that it was evident that Admiral Rojdestvensky had, on his arrival in the Far East, given his cruisers fresh instructions, cancelling those of last year, and promised to make inquiries on this point. These inquiries have, up to the present, led to no result.

Meanwhile, the Russian Government accepted the offer of His Majesty's Government to deliver instructions to the "Dnieper," as well as to the "Rion," "Kuban," and "Terek," to abstain from further hostile acts against British shipping, and promised to themselves send the instructions to these vessels as soon as located. His Majesty's ship "Perseus" has duly delivered the instructions to the three first-named ships at Jibuti, while the "Terek" received them through His Majesty's Consul at Batavia on her arrival at that port, where she is now interned.

On the 10th July, after reference to you and with your concurrence, a despatch was sent to Sir C. Hardinge setting out very fully the circumstances of the two cases, and intimating that claims would be presented by His Majesty's Government on behalf of the parties interested as soon as formulated, quite irrespective of any decision arrived at by a Prize Court. The words underlined were embodied in the despatch in consequence of a statement made by Count Lamsdorff in the conversation above referred to that any undertaking to provide compensation, without a decision to that effect having been rendered by a Prize Court, would prove the chief stumbling-block to the acceptance of the demands of His Majesty's Government.

A copy of these instructions, together with a despatch from Sir C. Hardinge dated the 22nd July, will be found in packet (H).

* Printed in italics.

Lord Lansdowne, speaking in the House of Lords on the 31st July with reference to these two cases, made use of the following words:—

"We have intimated that these claims will be pressed irrespective of the decision of the Russian Prize Court," though his Lordship had on the 13th July, in replying to Lord Muskerry's question as to the position of the shipping claims against the Russian Government, stated that: "It is essential in these cases the claimants should exhaust their legal remedies"; and the possible effect of these speeches is one of the circumstances that must be taken into account in determining how these claims shall be dealt with.

Sir C. Hardinge has, however, urged that in these cases also it would be desirable that Prize Court proceedings should take place, and states that there is some reason to hope that a satisfactory verdict would be obtained.

As reference is made in Sir C. Hardinge's despatch No. 106, and in his private letter, to the case of the "Knight Commander," it may be desirable to state that this vessel was sunk by the Russians about the 24th July, 1904, after she had been seized. Her papers were brought to Vladivostok, and the Prize Court decided that the sinking of the vessel was regular, as the Russian Regulations provide for sinking a prize if there are difficulties in the way of taking the ship to a Prize Court for adjudication.

A strong protest was addressed by His Majesty's Government to the Russian Government; and Count Lamsdorff was informed that full compensation would be claimed by the Secretary of State on behalf of the owners, quite irrespective of any decision that might be given in the Prize Courts.

The owners of the vessel, however, were encouraged privately to appeal against the Prize Court decision at Vladivostok in order that His Majesty's Government might not be exposed to the risk of an answer from the Russian Government that the parties were satisfied with the decision that the sinking of the vessel was justifiable, and had not troubled to appeal. (See pp. 33, 34, 95-99 of the "Knight Commander" print, packet (I)).

The decision of the Prize Court at Vladivostok was dated the 8th August, 1904; the appeal from that decision has not yet been decided, but the claim of the owners of the ship and cargo was presented to Count Lamsdorff on the 2nd March, 1905; apparently the Russian Government do not intend to consider it until after the appeal of the parties has been disposed of.

It may be mentioned that the claims of the owners of the "Ardova" for the detention of that vessel in the Red Sea in July 1904 by the Volunteer fleet vessel "Petersburgh" was presented to the Russian Government through the diplomatic channel on the 14th January, 1905, as a result of which a Commission was appointed to examine the claim at St. Petersburg. The Russian Government have made no demand in this case that the matter should be dealt with in a Prize Court, and by a note dated the 25th July, 1905, Count Lamsdorff informed Sir C. Hardinge that the Commission had come to a decision favourable in principle to the owner's claim, but raised certain questions as to the details, which are still under consideration.

It will be seen from the foregoing that His Majesty's Government are confronted with problems involving very weighty considerations both of law and policy. It is estimated that the claims against the Russian Government arising out of seizures, detentions, and destructions of British vessels during the war—some of which it is not necessary to include in the present reference—amount in the aggregate to between 300,000*l.* and 400,000*l.*

It is true that as a general principle every legal remedy should be exhausted before official aid can properly be invoked in ordinary cases; but the circumstances of many of the cases referred to above, especially that of the "Hipsang," are not of an ordinary character, and it has been shown how little prospect there is in the cases of the "Allanton" and "Calchas" of a Russian Prize Court of First Instance entertaining claims for compensation when the Supreme Admiralty Council have, on appeal, held that the seizures were justifiable; it is also not improbable that even if these cases eventually came before the Supreme Admiralty Council the result would be equally unsatisfactory. It is possible that in the end all these cases may have to be referred to arbitration, as Count Lamsdorff has more than once hinted, but no question of this kind arises at present.

I am, therefore, to request that you will take these questions into your consideration, and that you will favour Lord Lansdowne with your opinion at your early convenience on the following points:—

1. The "Allanton": (a.) Whether the claim of the owners should be presented through the diplomatic channel, or whether the owners should be informed that they must initiate proceedings in a Prize Court;

(b.) If you consider that the claim should be presented diplomatically, whether you approve the draft note contained in Sir C. Hardinge's No. 103, Treaty, of the 9th August, and what further or other arguments you consider might be employed with advantage;

(c.) Whether the claim on behalf of the officers and crew comes within Article 88 of the Russian Prize Court Regulations;

(d.) Whether the claim on behalf of the officers and crew should be presented through the diplomatic channel, and if so, on what ground.

2. The "Calchas": Whether the claim of the (a) owners and (b) Mr. McKinnon should be presented diplomatically, or whether the parties should be informed that they must commence proceedings in a Prize Court.

3. "Cilurnum": Whether the owners of the jettisoned cargo of this vessel should be told to institute proceedings before the Prize Court at Libau, to which the papers have been forwarded, or whether the claim should be presented diplomatically.

4. "Hipsang": Whether the claim of the owners should for the third time be presented to the Russian Government, and, if so, what arguments you consider should be employed to meet the Russian contentions.

5. Whether the claims in connection with the "Oldhamia," "St. Kilda," and "Tkhona" should be brought before the Prize Court, or presented through the diplomatic channel.

6. Lord Lansdowne would also be glad to receive any observations of a general nature you may be good enough to offer on the subjects dealt with in this reference.

I have, &c.

Report.

1.—(a.) That we think that the claim of the owners of the "Allanton" should be presented through the diplomatic channel.

Any proceedings in the Prize Court in respect of this claim would, in our opinion, be futile, in view of the finding of the Supreme Court that the seizure was justifiable. The detention consequent upon the erroneous decision of the Prize Court at Vladivostok does not afford a basis for any legal claim which could be enforced by any further proceedings.

(b.) We do not think that this claim can be put forward diplomatically as a matter of right, but as it is clear that there was a miscarriage in the Vladivostok Prize Court, we think that there is a strong claim for equitable consideration. Beyond this we are unable to suggest any arguments in addition to those used in the draft note contained in Sir C. Hardinge's despatch No. 103, Treaty, of the 10th August.

(c.) We do not think that the claim on behalf of the officers and crew comes within Article 88 of the Russian Prize Court Regulations.

(d.) This claim does not appear to be a strong one, as some hardship must in cases of this kind be almost always occasioned to the officers and crew concerned. We think, however, that the circumstances may fairly be brought to the notice of the Russian Government, through the diplomatic channel, in connection with the claim in respect of the ship. The facts, as set out in the statements on behalf of the officers and crew, should be briefly stated, in order that the Russian Government may consider the propriety of making some compensation. The prolonged detention appears to have been incidental to the miscarriage in the Vladivostok Prize Court. The removal of some of the men on board the Russian flag-ship would appear to have been improper, and it is alleged that while there they were exposed to unnecessary hardships.

2. Proceedings in a Prize Court in respect of the "Calchas" would appear to be useless, as the Supreme Court has found that the arrest and detention were justifiable.

We think that claims on behalf of the owners and of Mr. MacKinnon may properly be presented diplomatically. There seems to have been great and unnecessary delay, offering a marked contrast to the dispatch used in the case of the "Arabia," and there appears to be some ground for the suspicion that this delay is not unconnected with the efforts which were being made to induce the owners to sell the ship.

3. We think that, as a matter of policy on which we understand that our opinion is invited, it is probably desirable that the owners of the jettisoned cargo of the "Cilurnum" should be told to institute proceedings before the Prize Court at Libau, to which it is stated the papers have been forwarded. If they succeed in establishing the innocent nature of the cargo, they will obtain compensation on the ground that there was nothing to justify its destruction. There remains the broader ground, that even if the cargo were contraband it could only be brought in for adjudication, and that its destruction at sea entitles the owners to full compensation. We recommend that if it should be decided to advise the owners to take proceedings in the Prize Court, the Russian Government should be informed that His Majesty's Government reserves all rights in respect of the destruction of this cargo at sea, and will insist upon the payment of compensation whatever the result of proceedings in the Prize Court.

If redress is not obtained through the Prize Court, the claim may be pressed diplomatically, and may ultimately, with the other claims in dispute, be referred to arbitration.

4. This again is a question purely of policy. We understand that, in view of the assertion now made by the Russian Government that it was necessary to sink the "Hipsang" owing to her attempt to escape, Sir C. Hardinge has modified the opinion which he is stated, in the despatch under reply, to have held as to the propriety of dealing with this case through the diplomatic channel exclusively.

As the Russian Government now put forward this contention, it is difficult to say that we should refuse to allow it to be disposed of in the ordinary way through the machinery of the Prize Court, and it may be politic to advise the owners to take proceedings, as a finding in their favour on the question of fact would very much facilitate a satisfactory settlement.

We therefore recommend that this course should be taken. We must, however, at the same time observe that no country is bound to acquiesce in the finding of a Prize Court which is manifestly erroneous in point of law or perverse on questions of fact. The circumstances attending the sinking of the "Hipsang" are such that it appears impossible to conclude that she was sunk justifiably in order to prevent an escape.

We think, therefore, that His Majesty's Government should intimate to the Russian Government that all rights are reserved, and that even in the event—which they cannot anticipate—of a decision in the Prize Court that the sinking was justifiable, they would insist upon compensation.

Upon the materials before us the case appears to be a very flagrant one, but proceedings in the Prize Court may provide a way out of the deadlock, and, if properly guarded, need not prejudice the enforcement of the claim through the diplomatic channel.

5. The claims in connection with the "Oldhamia" should certainly be brought before the Prize Court in the first instance. It appears to us to be far from clear that the "Oldhamia" was not being taken into Vladivostok for adjudication when the wreck took place. The Prize Court is the appropriate Tribunal for determining all questions as to the character of the cargo and as to the wreck of the vessel and subsequent destruction of the cargo.

As regards the "St. Kilda" and the "Ikhona," His Majesty's Government would be quite justified in proceeding diplomatically, but it appears to us that, as a matter of policy, it is probably desirable that the course advocated by Sir Charles Hardinge of sending these cases, in the first instance, to the Prize Court should be adopted. The question whether the cargoes in these cases were contraband is independent of the broad principle asserted by His Majesty's Government that whether they were contraband or not, the destruction of the vessel at sea entitles the owners to compensation. If it be decided in the Prize Court that the cargo was innocent, the difficulty will be solved, and compensation will be awarded to the owners.

It is, however, essential, if the owners are asked to take proceedings, that it should be made quite clear to them and to the Russian Government that His Majesty's Government will, irrespective of any finding of the Prize Court, insist upon compensation on the broad ground of principle that the destruction of neutral vessels—without adjudication—entails in every case liability for the damages sustained.

6. We have only to add that if it should be decided, as a matter of policy, to invite the owners to take proceedings in the first instance—the owners in the cases of the "Cilurnum," the "Hipsang," the "St. Kilda," and the "Ikhona," should be informed fully of the grounds which render this course expedient, and that they, and also the Russian Government, should be told that if it should become necessary ultimately to press for payment through the diplomatic channel the costs incurred by them in these proceedings will be added to their claims.

We do not think that there is in the statement which has been publicly made on behalf of His Majesty's Government, that claims in respect of sunk vessels would be pressed irrespective of the decisions of the Russian Prize Court, anything inconsistent with the policy of having these cases first taken before the Prize Courts. Indeed, on the 31st July, 1905, your Lordship, in answer to a question put by the Earl of Camperdown in the House of Lords, used language clearly indicating that you contemplated proceedings in the Prize Court in such cases (Hansard, vol. cl., 893). What has been said, however, makes it indispensable that the right of His Majesty's Government to enforce these claims should be reserved, and that it should be made clear that they in no way consent to be bound by the decisions of the Prize Court in such cases.

Annex.

WHEREAS by the Extradition Acts, 1870 to 1895, it was amongst other things enacted that, where an arrangement has been made with any foreign State with respect to the surrender to such State of any fugitive criminals, His Majesty may, by Order in Council, direct that the said Acts shall apply in the case of such foreign State; and that His Majesty may, by the same or any subsequent Order, limit the operation of the Order, and restrict the same to fugitive criminals who are in or suspected of being in the part of His Majesty's dominions specified in the Order, and render the operation thereof subject to such conditions, exceptions, and qualifications as may be deemed expedient;

And whereas a Treaty was concluded on the 26th day of November, 1880, between Her late Majesty Queen Victoria and the Swiss Federal Council, for the mutual extradition of fugitive criminals, in the case of which Treaty the Extradition Acts of 1870 and 1873 were applied by Order in Council of the 18th May, 1881;

And whereas a Supplementary Convention was concluded on the 29th day of June, 1904, between His Majesty and the Federal Council of the Swiss Confederation, amending Article XVIII of the said Treaty of the 26th November, 1880, for the mutual extradition of fugitive criminals, which Supplementary Convention is in the terms following:—

And whereas the ratifications of the said Supplementary Convention were exchanged at London on the 29th day of March, 1905;

Now, therefore, His Majesty, by and with the advice of His Privy Council, and in virtue of the authority committed to him by the said recited Acts, doth order, and it is hereby ordered, that from and after the day of 1905, the said Acts shall apply in the case of Switzerland, under and in accordance with the said Treaty, as amended by the said Supplementary Convention above set forth.

Provided always that the operation of the said Acts shall be and remain suspended within the Dominion of Canada so long as an Act of the Parliament of Canada passed in 1886, and entitled "An Act respecting the Extradition of Fugitive Criminals," shall continue in force there, and no longer.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, January 16, 1905.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit to you a letter from the India Office and its inclosures, together with the other papers noted in the accompanying list which relate more particularly to the question of the status in the Ottoman dominions of subjects of the native States in India. The wider question of the status of such persons in foreign countries generally is also discussed.

It will be seen from Inclosure 2 in the India Office letter (Paper C) that Major Newmarch, Political Resident in Turkish Arabia and Consul-General at Bagdad, has recently referred, for the consideration of the Government of India, certain cases arising within his jurisdiction involving questions as to the Courts before which such persons should be tried, the administration of their estates, and generally as to the degree of protection which should be accorded them.

A further despatch from Major Newmarch of the 5th April, 1904 (Paper D), incloses the opinion of the Judge of the Supreme Court at Constantinople on these points.

The views of the Government of India, both on the questions thus raised and also on the wider question of the protection in foreign countries of the subjects of Indian native States, are fully set forth in their letter of the 17th March, 1904 (Paper B).

A note by the Legal Adviser, India Office, of the 13th May, 1904 (Paper E), is also inclosed; while the views and suggestions of the Secretary of State for India in Council are contained in the India Office letter of the 7th July, 1904 (Paper A), which, in forwarding the above correspondence, incloses in addition correspondence which had passed between the Political Resident in Turkish Arabia and the Government of India in 1893-1894 (Paper F), when the matter was previously under consideration.

A Memorandum, which has been drawn up by Mr. Hurst, Assistant Legal Adviser to this Department, is also inclosed (Paper G).

The further papers (H to Q) are those referred to in the foregoing correspondence.

I have the honour to request that you will be good enough to take these papers into your consideration, and that you will favour Lord Lansdowne with your opinion on the following points:—

1. Whether the opinion of your predecessors expressed in their Report of the 8th June, 1893 (Paper H), paragraph 1, bears the interpretation: That the Secretary of State is entitled to extend to British-protected persons abroad the same measure of protection as to British subjects except in so far as the right or power to exercise which protection depends upon a Treaty Agreement or Law which excludes "or cannot be construed as including such protected persons," but that not being British subjects, they are not entitled to such protection as of right;

2. Whether, having regard to the terms of the Capitulations, the Secretary of State has the power to place such persons on the same footing in the Ottoman dominions as British subjects in the matter of protection and jurisdiction;

His Lordship will also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general nature which you may desire to offer upon the papers now submitted to you.

I am to add that this reference has been submitted to the Secretary of State for India in Council for his observations, and that Mr. Brodrick concurs in its terms.

Report.

1. We do not think that our predecessors in their Report of the 8th June, 1893, laid down that British-protected persons abroad were not entitled as of right to protection, and, in our opinion, British-protected persons are so entitled.

When the whole control of foreign relations has been assumed by His Majesty's Government it appears to us that the duty of protection follows. What measure of protection can be given must depend upon the extent of the jurisdiction enjoyed by His Majesty's Government in the country where the protection is desired. If that jurisdiction is confined to those who are, in the strict technical sense of our municipal law, British subjects, it cannot be exercised in respect of protected persons.

2. We see nothing in the Capitulations to prevent the Secretary of State from placing British-protected persons on the same footing in the Ottoman dominions as British subjects in the matter of protection and jurisdiction, and we think that the Ottoman Order in Council of 1899, in its definition of "British subject," plainly asserts this right which, so far as we know, has not been disputed by the Porte.

3. We think that the right asserted in the Order in Council to treat protected persons in the Ottoman dominions as on the same footing with British subjects should be adhered to.

Foreign Office, March 16, 1905.

Gentlemen,

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list, which relate to applications made by Fatma Hanem, widow of the late Menshawi Pasha, an Ottoman subject, and Rakel, daughter of Helal Sassoon, and widow of the late Elyak Rivan, an Ottoman subject, for readmission to British nationality.

Fatma Hanem and Rakel Rivan: re-admission of to British nationality.

I am to invite your attention to the correspondence and Minutes (Paper G) which passed in 1899 with reference to an application made by Mrs. Abigail Maimaran, widow of Isaac Maimaran, a Moorish subject, for readmission to British nationality. These papers were amongst those submitted to, and discussed by, the inter-Departmental Committee appointed in 1899 to consider difficulties which have arisen with regard to the interpretation of the Naturalization Acts; the Committee, however, considered that the point involved was one relating rather to the law of marriage than to that of nationality, and did not make any recommendation with regard to it.

I am also to draw attention to the Report of the Judicial Adviser to the Egyptian Government for the year 1901 (Paper H), at p. 43 of which reference is made to the case of Fatma Hanem, and at p. 48 of which appear comments by Mr. Mellwraith on the general question of the nationality of a European woman marrying an Ottoman subject.

In the present cases it will be observed that, owing to the non-fulfilment of the conditions of residence prescribed by section 8 of "The Naturalization Act, 1870," by the applicants, no steps can be taken by His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department for the grant of a certificate. The question, however, arises as to whether the marriages contracted by these ladies with Ottoman subjects were of a kind which would be recognized as valid by the English Courts on the ground that they were valid by the lex loci; and on the answer to this question depends whether Fatma Harem and Rakel Rivan can, in accordance with section 10 (1) of "The Naturalization Act, 1870," be deemed to be subjects of the State of which their late husbands were subjects, and consequently to have lost their status as British subjects.

I am to request that you will take these papers into your consideration, and that you will be so good as to favour Lord Lansdowne with your opinion as to whether, for the purposes of section 10 (1) of "The Naturalization Act, 1870," the marriage of an Englishwoman must be understood to mean such a marriage alone as is recognized as valid in contemplation of English law, or whether a marriage which, though not per se valid in contemplation of English law, is binding according to the lex loci celebrationis and the personal law of the husband will satisfy the requirements of the Statute.

In our opinion section 10 (1) and (2) of the Naturalization Act refers not merely to marriage such as is contemplated by English law for the purposes of the construction of an English settlement or of jurisdiction of the Divorce Court. These provisions are of general application, and we think that they apply in the case even of polygamous marriages in countries where such marriages are lawful. This would clearly be so if the woman, being a Mohammedan subject of His Majesty or of any Mohammedan Power, contracted a polygamous marriage with a subject of another country in which polygamy is lawful. We do not think that an exception can be made from its provisions in the case of a Christian woman who contracts a polygamous marriage with a foreigner. When the marriage is valid according to the law of the country where it is contracted, we think the woman acquires the nationality as well as the domicile of her husband.

The following papers relative to the patrol of the territorial waters of Crete by the public ships of the Patrolling Powers were referred to the Law Officers for their opinion:—

(No. 1.)

Consul-General Howard to the Marquess of Lansdowne.—(Received May 6.)

(No. 2. Treaty.)

My Lord,

Canea, Crete, April 22, 1905.

Importation of arms into Crete: pat-

I HAVE the honour to inform you that Captain Christian, of His Majesty's ship "Juno," upon receipt of instructions on the 18th instant from the Commander-in-chief of the Mediterranean Squadron ordering him to cruise round the Cretan coast and prevent the landing of arms, came to me and asked me upon what authority he could act for this purpose. He requested that the High Commissioner should issue authority to the ships of the four Powers to search suspected vessels in Cretan territorial waters and prevent disembarkation of arms and ammunition.

At a meeting of the Consuls, which was held immediately on the same day to consider the question, it was decided to ask Prince George to issue a letter of authority for the object in view. The doyen of the Consuls, Count Negri, went round at once to the Palace and asked, through His Royal Highness' aide-de-camp, whether the High Commissioner would object to issue this letter of authority. His Royal Highness sent back word that he considered that it was rather for the Powers than for him to give the required authority to their ships.

In view of this reply the Consuls drew up a procès-verbal, copy of which I inclose, authorizing the ships to search for arms in the neighbourhood of Cape Spada, that being the place indicated by the Commandant of Gendarmerie as the spot at which arms would probably be disembarked.

Your Lordship will observe that the operations of the ships contemplated in the procès-verbal are of a more limited nature than those contemplated in the instructions issued from the Commander-in-chief.

Some of the Commanders of the foreign stationnaires are, I understand, averse to undertaking operations on such a large scale, on the ground that they would appear to be more in the nature of a blockade than of mere police measures within territorial waters, which are all that are required at present.

The question has also been raised whether the authority of the Consuls, failing that of the High Commissioner, is sufficient to warrant the search in Cretan territorial waters of suspected vessels, no matter what flag they may fly.

It seems that vessels suspected of hostile intent in time of peace, under which description those carrying arms for insurgents might be included, may be legally subjected to search in the territorial waters of a State. Therefore, as the stationnaires are the ships of the Protecting Powers of the island, it would appear that the authorization either of the Consuls of these Powers or of the Local Government to search vessels and seize arms and ammunition in territorial waters ought to be legally sufficient. The case, however, being a new one, and the question being also one which might not improbably lead to difficulties with sailing-vessels of foreign Powers, I should be greatly obliged if your Lordship would inform me, at as early a date as possible, how you consider that the search and seizure of arms on the Cretan coast may best be carried out without incurring any risk of violations of international law.

Captain Tupper, of His Majesty's ship "Venus," suggested that it would be as well for ships engaged in this patrol duty to have a few gendarmes on board who could board Greek, Turkish, or Cretan ships, and who could land and arrest persons guilty of infringing the Cretan Law against the carrying of arms. This suggestion was approved by the High Commissioner, the Consuls, and the foreign naval officers, and has, therefore, been put into execution.

I have, &c.
(Signed) ESME HOWARD.

P.S.—My Italian and French colleagues called on me last night, and said that the plan of patrolling operations arranged between Captain Tupper and the foreign naval officers at Suda was more extensive than they thought advisable at present. My French colleague went further, and said that his instructions would not permit his concurrence in such an extended programme on the part of the French stationnaire "Condor." The French, he said, had only one ship at Suda, and he did not consider it well to send her away for too long at a time. They also pointed out to me that this plan of operations was quite different from that contemplated in the procès-verbal of the Consuls inclosed in this despatch, which restricts the operations of the vessels to the neighbourhood of Cape Spada.

I pointed out that this was too limited a field of operations, and that I had talked once on the matter to the Commandant of the Gendarmerie, who considered that the coast-line from Rethymo on the north, round the west coast to Sphakia on the south, might all be patrolled with advantage, but I agreed that, beyond this, it appeared for the present useless to go.

To this they consented, and the French Consul-General has telegraphed to his Government for permission for the "Condor" to act within the limits above stated.

LES Consuls-Généraux des Puissances Protectrices ont reçu de M. le Commandant de la Gendarmerie Crétoise une lettre en date du 3 (16) Avril leur signalant l'éventualité possible de tentatives de débarquement du côté du Cap Spada d'armes à feu destinées aux insurgés et leur demandant de faire exercer une surveillance dans ces parages par l'un des stationnaires.

Les Consuls-Généraux en ayant référé à Son Altesse Royale le Prince, Haut Commissaire, pour avoir de Son Altesse Royale une approbation confirmative de cette démarche, le Haut Commissaire a bien voulu leur faire connaître à ce sujet qu'à son avis il appartenait aux Puissances Protectrices de pourvoir directement aux mesures tendant au maintien du statut politique de l'île de Crète. En conséquence, les Consuls-Généraux se jugent autorisés à faire droit à la demande qui leur a été adressée par le Commandant de la Gendarmerie Crétoise et à y donner suite par l'exercice de la surveillance qu'elle peut comporter ; ils sont donc unanimement d'accord pour requérir, aux fins d'assurer cette croisière pendant le laps de temps qui sera nécessaire, leurs stationnaires respectifs, au moyen d'un service de roulement à organiser par entente entre leurs Commandants.

Xalépa, le 6 (19) Avril, 1905.

Minutes.

So long as the operations are confined to the territorial waters of Crete, I do not think that any questions of difficulty with the non-Protecting Powers are likely to arise ; but of course, directly anything is done to a merchant vessel flying the commercial flag of a non-guaranteeing Power on the high seas, the fat will be in the fire, and a great conflagration may ensue.

Consul-General Howard's despatch does not confine the question in terms, or indeed, at all distinctly, to operations within Cretan territorial waters, but I assume that probably his observations, and also the Admiralty instructions, only contemplate this case, and I am, therefore, in this Minute only dealing with such interference within territorial waters.

I think that His Royal Highness Prince George could not properly give authority or orders to the ships of the Protecting Powers.

The natural course would appear to me to be for the High Commissioner, as the responsible spokesman for the internal Government of Crete, to call the attention of the Protecting Powers to the fact that peace and good order was being seriously imperilled by the illicit introduction of arms, &c., contrary to the laws, Ordinances, or Proclamations of his Government, and to request the Protecting Powers to assist the Government of Crete by policing such parts of the Cretan territorial waters as were specially open to these operations.

It would be neither unnatural nor unprecedented, nor, so far as I can see, in any way objectionable that the Powers should comply with this request, and assist the Government of Crete thereby to maintain the peace and good order which they have guaranteed, but which the Cretan Government is now powerless to maintain without their assistance.

To mention two somewhat analogous instances : we have, at the request of Persia, allowed a gun-boat to police Persian waters, and to seize, on behalf of the Persian Government, arms which were being introduced into Persia with, as was believed, an ultimate destination beyond Persia. We have also acted in a similar manner within the territorial waters of Muscat.

The essential point is that there should be a request on the part of the Sovereign or nominal Ruler, without which, of course, the foreign State would be guilty not only of a violation of the territorial waters, and an offence against the sovereignty of the Ruler, but also of an offence against the State to the nationals of which the merchant vessel which was interfered with belonged, for the public ship of the foreign State would, in this case, be acting entirely without authority from any person who was entitled to confer it.

Possibly, as this is a very important question, Lord Lansdowne would like the Law Officers to see the papers before any instructions are given to Mr. Howard. I have written rather a long Minute in anticipation of that course being followed, and for the purpose of saving time if it be followed.

Unless the Protecting Powers were prepared to recognize the insurgents as belligerents (which I assume that they are not prepared to do), it would, I think, be very unwise to take any measures outside Cretan waters.

My Lord,

Canea, Crete, May 13, 1905.

WITH reference to your Lordship's telegram No. 45 of the 10th instant, requesting me to send home by post copies of Cretan movement Ordinances, Proclamations, &c., regarding customs control, importation of arms, right of search and seizure within territorial waters, I have the honour to report to your Lordship that there have never been any Ordinances or Proclamations issued by the present Cretan Government on the subject, the only document ever published referring to the importation of arms in Crete was a Circular addressed to the Customs authorities ; but it has been impossible for me to obtain a copy of it, and it seems to have been lost by the authorities to whom it was addressed. However, the Director of the Customs at Canea informed me that the Circular in question contained the following paragraph :—

"If the importers of arms are merchants, they must obtain a written declaration from the Prefect of the town ; if, on the other hand, they are simply private persons, they must have a permission for carrying arms."

With regard to the right of search, the Customs Law, copy of which I have the honour to inclose, deals with the matter on p. 44.

The right of seizure is likewise treated in the Customs Law, Chapter XII, p. 54.

Minute.

I am afraid that the "Loi Douanière" does not help us much, nor does anything contained in this despatch either.

It seems to me still, as I have said on a previous occasion, that Prince George of Greece cannot give orders to the British Senior Naval Officer direct.

This, as I understand it, was His Royal Highness' own view when the doyen of the Consular Body (Count Negri) made application to him on the subject.

The proper course would seem to me to be that Prince George, as the mandatory of the Powers, should request the Powers to aid him in preserving the peace and good order of the island by patrolling the territorial waters against the introduction of arms and ammunition—a matter which he is personally powerless to carry out himself, as His Royal Highness has no sufficient naval force at his disposal.

It is then for the Powers, having accepted the appeal thus made to them, to give the requisite orders to their respective naval officers accordingly.

Report by the Law Officers.

The only point for our opinion arising upon these papers is as to the patrolling of the waters round Crete for the purpose of preventing the importation of arms.

As no state of belligerency has been recognized, it is not possible to proclaim a blockade in the proper sense of the term. And the attempt to enforce what is called a pacific blockade might give rise to serious difficulties with other Powers.

It appears to us that the operations must be confined to the territorial waters, and must be carried out under the authority of the territorial Sovereign. It seems to be assumed in the papers that the right to exercise territorial sovereignty is vested in Prince George as High Commissioner; so, if this be so, the Powers would be justified, with his consent, in directing their vessels to prevent within territorial waters any attempt to bring arms for debarkation in Crete, and such measures might be taken against the offenders as the local law permits.

Minute.

I am not sure that the 'patrolling' of the waters round Crete would be strictly confined to the actual territorial waters unless strict and clear injunctions to that effect were given to the naval officers responsible, and I therefore thought it best to raise the question in my Minute.

The Law Officers agree with the views therein expressed, and, if Lord Lansdowne approves, I think they may now safely serve as a basis for such further instructions as it may be considered advisable to issue.

OTTOMAN DOMINIONS.

Draft Order in Council.

WHEREAS by Treaty, capitulation, grant, usage, sufferance, and other lawful means, His Majesty the King has jurisdiction within the dominions of the Ottoman Porte;

And whereas it is expedient to amend "The Ottoman Order in Council, 1899" (hereinafter referred to as "The Principal Order");

Now, therefore, His Majesty, by virtue and in exercise of the powers in this behalf by "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," or otherwise, in His Majesty vested, is pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, as follows:—

1. Article 49 of the Principal Order is hereby repealed, and the following provisions are substituted in lieu thereof, that is to say:

"Subject to Rules of Court made under this Order, the Court may, out of any moneys in its hands arising from fees of Court or other fees, or moneys received under the Principal Order, or this Order, order payment of allowances in respect of their reasonable expenses to any complainant or witnesses attending before the Court on the trial of any criminal case with a jury or assessors (including the preliminary examination of the accused antecedent thereto), and also fees and costs to legal practitioners and allowances to jurors, assessors, interpreters, medical practitioners, and other persons in respect of services rendered in criminal cases.

No. 20.

[October 14, 1905.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 26, 1905.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to inclose, for your consideration, the papers noted in the accompanying List respecting the national status of children born in the Ottoman dominions of naturalized British subjects.

The first case is set out in a despatch from Mr. Drummond Hay, His Majesty's Consul-General at Beyrout, inclosing a petition from two persons named Kalim and Zaim Salamony, born in Syria in 1875 and 1877 respectively, that they may be registered as British subjects. They are the sons of one Anthony H. Salamony, who was naturalized in this country, in 1868, under the Act of 1844, and was not re-naturalized under section 7 of "The Naturalization Act, 1870." It will be seen, from the opinion of the Law Officers of the 13th May, 1884, of which a copy is inclosed, that section 10 (5) of the Act of 1870 cannot be deemed to have a retroactive effect, and, in pursuance of this opinion, it has hitherto been the practice not to regard children born abroad, in these circumstances, as British subjects. There have been several departmental decisions to that effect.

The second case is an application from a Mr. Knechtel, of Austrian origin, who was naturalized in London in 1900, that the birth of his daughter may be included in the Consular register of births of British subjects born at Constantinople. It is one of those cases which are referred to in paragraphs 53-56 of the Report of the recent Departmental Committee on Naturalization, of which a copy is inclosed, and, had the case arisen in a foreign State other than one in which His Majesty exercises extra-territorial jurisdiction, it is clear that the child could not be deemed to be a naturalized British subject.

The question, however, arises whether, having regard to the opinion expressed in your Report of the 18th August, 1904, of which a copy is inclosed, the provisions of the Naturalization Acts above cited have any application to these two cases and to others of a similar kind, which may hereafter arise in countries where the King exercises extra-territorial jurisdiction.

You stated, in your Report of that date, that the Acts of 1730 and 1773 had no application to the persons whose status was then under discussion, and held that they were British subjects at common law, as they were born within the King's allegiance and not under the legiance of another Sovereign.

The reasoning you there adopted appears to cover the cases mentioned in the papers inclosed herewith, as the individuals referred to were born to British subjects, and are individuals to whose allegiance the Porte appears to make no claim.

The status of the issue of naturalized persons was not, however, under consideration at the time when that Report was given, and Lord Lansdowne desires to have your opinion before applying it to the present cases.

I have accordingly to request that you will take these papers and circumstances into your consideration, and that you will favour Lord Lansdowne with your opinion—

(a.) As to whether the petition of Messrs. Kalim and Zaim Salamony to be registered as British subjects at Beyrout can properly be entertained; and

(b.) Whether His Majesty's Consul at Constantinople should be authorized to include the name of Mr. Knechtel's infant daughter in the register of births of British subjects at Constantinople.

His Lordship would further be glad to receive any observations of a general character which you may have to offer as to the treatment of similar cases which may arise in countries where His Majesty exercises extra-territorial jurisdiction other than the Ottoman dominions.

The Attorney-General's Opinion.

(a.) In my opinion Messrs. Salamony should not be registered.

I agree with the opinion of the Law Officers in 1884, that section 10 (5) of the Act of 1870 does not apply in the case of certificates granted under the Act of 1844. Nor can the claim be supported on the ground that the applicants were born within the allegiance of the British Crown. They were born in Syria, and the certificate held by their father excepted from the grant to him of the rights of a British subject any such rights out of the dominions of the British Crown other than under a passport.

The grounds on which we held, in our Report of the 18th August, 1904, that the children of natural-born British subjects born in Turkey should be considered as born within the allegiance of the British Crown have, therefore, no application to the present case.

I observe, moreover, that the certificate determined in case of absence from the United Kingdom for six months without a licence. The father of the applicants was in Syria from 1875 to 1878, and it is not stated that he had a licence.

There does not appear to have been, in cases such as that of the present applicants, any such well-established practice as existed in the case on which we reported in 1904, and which, in our opinion, would have justified the treatment of the persons in question as British subjects within the meaning of the Capitulations, even if not British subjects for all purposes. This application should therefore be refused.

(b.) I think that the application in the case of Mr. Knechtel's infant daughter should be granted. The father holds a certificate, under the Act of 1870, which is unqualified, and confers on him, according to what, in my opinion, is the true construction of the somewhat clumsy provisions of section 7, the privileges of a British subject everywhere, except in Austria, if he remains an Austrian subject.

The provisions of section 10 (5) have no application to the case of children born within the allegiance of the British Crown. Such children are British subjects at common law, and to read section 10 (5) as depriving such children, when the father is a naturalized British subject, of their status as British subjects, unless they had resided with him in the United Kingdom, would be to put them in a worse position than the children of an alien, who, by the mere fact of birth within the allegiance, are British subjects. The provisions of section 10 (5) apply only to the case of children born out of the allegiance, and confer on them the privilege of naturalization subject to the condition of residence in the United Kingdom with the parent.

In my opinion an alien who has been naturalized under the Act of 1870 stands, for the purposes of the present question, on the same footing with a natural-born British subject. M. Knechtel was never a Turkish subject, and, for the reasons given in our Report of 1904, I think—though the question is, as we there stated, one of difficulty—that his children born in Turkey should be treated as born within the allegiance of the British Crown, and that they are, therefore, entitled to be registered.

I have nothing to add, in the way of general observations, to what I have said above, in giving my reasons for my conclusions.

TURKEY.—UNITED STATES.

The Solicitor-General's Opinion.

(a.) I agree with the opinion of the Attorney-General.
 (b.) In my opinion the infant daughter of Mr. Knechtel is not a British subject. The Act of 1870 does not place the children of a naturalized British subject, in all respects, upon the same footing as those of a natural-born British subject, and, in my opinion, such children, if born in a foreign country over which His Majesty exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction, would not be held to have been born within the allegiance of the British Crown.

Having regard, however, to the opinion of the Attorney-General and the difficulties of the question, I think the safer course would be to accede to the application of Mr. Knechtel.

 Extradition

 tion.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, January 12, 1905.

WITH reference to your report dated the 16th November, 1904, relative to the proposed Supplementary Extradition Convention between this country and the United States, I have the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit to you the accompanying correspondence with the United States' Ambassador (Papers A and B) with regard to the terms of the last paragraph of Article II of the draft Convention.

It will be seen that, for the reasons mentioned in his note of the 6th instant, Mr. Choate is of opinion that the terms of this paragraph, which were suggested in your report of the 16th November, would, so far at any rate as the United States is concerned, render the Convention nugatory.

A copy of your report of the 16th November, 1904, is also inclosed (Paper C) for convenience of reference.

I have the honour to request that you will take this further correspondence into your consideration, and will favour Lord Lansdowne with your opinion whether any further, and if so what, amendment should be made in the wording of this paragraph in order to meet the objections raised by his Excellency.

I have, &c.

Report.

We are unable to follow the reasoning in Mr. Choate's note of the 6th instant. But, although we do not think the form of words proposed by Mr. Choate very happy, the point is not one of any great consequence. So long as it is clearly understood that publication is to be made by this country only when the necessary alteration in the law has been effected, Mr. Choate's formula may be accepted.

Annex.

Mr. Choate to the Marquess of Lansdowne.

American Embassy, London, January 6th, 1905.

My Lord,

REFERRING to . . . our conversations since on the subject of the date at which our proposed Treaty adding bribery and offences against Bankruptcy Law shall come into force, I have the honour to say that I did not intend that the formula proposed by me for the last paragraph of Article II of the draft Convention should be ambiguous, and was a little surprised that it was thought to be so.

Perhaps I did not state to you with sufficient clearness what my idea on the subject was, and you will permit me to restate it.

I proposed to have that clause read, "It shall come into force ten days after its publication in conformity with the laws of the High Contracting Parties" &c., exactly as it does in our Convention of 13th December, 1900, which differed from its form in our Convention of 12th July, 1889, wherein it read, "In conformity with the forms prescribed by the laws of the High Contracting Parties," &c.

It seemed to me that, with the clause expressed as I have proposed, as long as there was no law authorizing or approving the Treaty, there could not possibly be any "publication of it in conformity with the law of England." Such a publication of it, without an Act of Parliament authorizing or approving the Treaty, would be contrary to the law of England instead of in conformity with it, and you would have full control of it by simply withholding the publication. I did not intend my expression "as merely referring to publication according to law," so you may possibly be able to reconsider this somewhat minute point.

There is a difficulty in the phraseology of the clause, as indicated in red ink on the draft inclosed in your Lordship's note of 21st November, which I will endeavour to explain. In seeking to meet the objection which I made to your original draft, that it made the Treaty, though the same should be executed, incomplete and a dead letter until a further Agreement should be entered into between the parties, fixing the date when it should come into force, it uses this language:—

"It shall come into force . . . days after the publication of the Treaty by the High Contracting Parties, and such publication shall be made whenever the laws of the High Contracting Parties then in force provide for the granting of extradition in the cases hereinbefore mentioned."

This seems to have been drawn upon the theory that as it will require an Act of Parliament on your part to include bribery and offences against Bankruptcy Law in the list of extraditable crimes, so it will require an Act of Congress on our part to effect the same result. But the Treaty itself, when it comes into force, after its execution under the authority of the President and its ratification by the Senate alone, without the House of Representatives, becomes by the Constitution the supreme law of the land, and will have on our part the desired effect, but until it does come into force it does not become law. Now the clause, as drafted in red, provides that the Treaty shall not come into force until . . . days after publication, and in the same breath that it shall not "be published until after it has come into force," so that it is difficult to see exactly how it could come into force at all. The law of our "Contracting Party providing for the granting of extradition in the cases mentioned" would be the Treaty itself, coming into force by its own terms. The result, then, would be that it would not come into force until . . . days after publication, and publication should not take place until after it had come into force. If I am right in the interpretation of the language proposed, it would create an impasse, and the Treaty would not come into force at all.

Should your Lordship still be of opinion, after reconsidering what I have said about the form proposed by me, that it would still leave the matter ambiguous and so be inadmissible, would it not be well, as the approaching Session of Parliament is now so near, to prepare and introduce, at the very beginning of the Session, the necessary Act, adding "bribery" to the schedules of the existing Acts? I assume that "offences against Bankruptcy Laws" are already included by the Amending Act of 1873, as I see it is one of the enumerated crimes contained in most of your recent extradition Treaties. This might be done without waiting for the Treaty to be signed. Enough that the Act of Parliament shall have included this added crime within the schedule list.

If this were done I cannot help thinking that the Act would, in a few days after the opening of the Session, be finally passed, and this difficulty be put out of our way.

I have, &c.

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.:

FRANCE.

No. 1.

[October 19, 1906.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 30, 1906.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State, to transmit to you the inclosed papers relating to an application for a certificate of British nationality made by Mr. Wilfred Judah Messiah, of Oran, in order to enable him to claim exemption from military service in France.

W. J. Messiah's claim to British nationality to escape military service in France.

The application was forwarded by His Majesty's Consul-General at Algiers on the 23rd April last (Paper 1), and is supported by the accompanying documents, viz.:—

(a.) Contract of marriage at Mogador (27th August, 1862), in accordance with Hebrew religious law, between the father and mother of the applicant, Moses Messiah and Esther Youli (or July).

(c.) Certificate of the birth of the father of the applicant, the aforesaid Moses Messiah, at Gibraltar, the 13th March, 1828.

The documents were forwarded to the Home Office in order that the necessary steps might be taken in the matter, and I am to inclose a letter from that Department in reply (Paper 2), stating that the marriage of the father of the applicant, on the validity of which the claim of the latter for a certificate of British nationality depends, appears to have been of a polygamous character (see passages underlined in the Marriage Contract); but that, having regard to the case of Isaac Aaron Abensur in 1897, Mr. Gladstone proposes, subject to the concurrence of Sir E. Grey, to issue the desired certificate.

With regard to the case of Isaac Aaron Abensur referred to, I am to inclose a copy (in print) of the correspondence, &c., which passed in the matter (Paper 3), and I am especially to call attention to the Memorandum on p. 9, in which the facts of the case and the opinions expressed thereon are fully set forth, and also to the subsequent opinion of the then Lord Chancellor (Lord Halsbury). The decision arrived at in the matter will be found on p. 38 in a Minute of the late Lord Salisbury, as follows:—

"This opinion" (that of the Lord Chancellor) "must be accepted as the best exposition of the existing law that we can obtain, in the absence of any decided case. Therefore Mr. Abensur's children must be registered."

Sir E. Grey feels, however, some hesitation in accepting the decision arrived at in the Abensur case as conclusive of the question whether the offspring of a polygamous marriage, contracted according to the Hebrew religious law prevailing in Morocco, are, according to English law, legitimate, inasmuch as the views of the late Lord Chancellor differed in some material respects from those of the then Attorney-General (now Lord Chief Justice of England) and the then Solicitor-General (Sir Robert Finlay), besides being directly in conflict with the opinion of previous Law Officers given in the case of Abdul Kerim Grant (see p. 25 of print).

Moreover, so far as Sir E. Grey is aware, none of the other legal authorities, before whom the case indirectly or directly came, took quite the same view as the then Lord Chancellor; and in these circumstances he is disposed to think that it would be dangerous to accept as finally conclusive of the question what was not a judicial decision, but merely an opinion of the ex-Lord Chancellor, without at any rate giving the matter fuller consideration.

I am therefore, in forwarding these papers, to request that you will be good enough to favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion, whether in the present case the applicant for a certificate of British nationality, Mr. Wilfred Judah Messiah being the offspring of a marriage of a polygamic character, is to be regarded as legitimate in contemplation of English law, and, if so, on what ground?

Sir E. Grey would also be glad to receive any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer on the papers now submitted to you.

I have, &c.

(Signed) ERIC BARRINGTON.

List of Papers.

- (1.) Consul-General Hay-Newton, No. 6, Treaty, April 23, 1906; and documents A, B, and C.
- (2.) Home Office, June 30, 1906.
- (3.) Correspondence relative to the registration of the children of I. A. Abensur in Morocco (Confidential No. 7323). 1897-1899.

Report.

We understand the facts to be that Moses Messiah, the father of the applicant, is a natural-born British subject who, at the time of his marriage with Esther Youli, was domiciled in Algeria, and that such marriage is valid according to the Jewish law and to the law of the domicile of the parties, and of the place where the marriage was contracted, namely, Algeria.

We think that such marriage, in spite of its polygamous character, is valid by English law for the purpose of conferring British nationality upon the offspring on the ground that it is a good marriage according to the law of the domicile of the parties and of the place where the marriage was contracted, and also of their religion, if that be material, although such marriage would be considered in England as invalid for the purpose of succession to land in England, or of claiming the assistance of the matrimonial Courts there.

We think, therefore, that the applicant is entitled to British nationality on the ground that he is the legitimate (for this purpose) son—born out of His Majesty's dominions of a natural-born British father.

We offer no opinion on the question whether the possession of a certificate of British nationality will enable the applicant to escape military service in France.

No. 14.

[Treasury Solicitor.]

[March 27, 1906.]

"My Lords,

"Foreign Office, November 27, 1905.

"I HAVE the honour to submit Sir Edward Fitzgerald Law's claim to receive a diplomatic pension in respect of his services as Commercial Attaché, for which he has qualified under the Act 32 & 33 Vict., cap. 43. I would refer your Lordships to the correspondence which passed on the subject between the two Departments in 1890, and more especially to Sir F. Mowatt's letter of the 21st June (3458), in which it was stated that the Treasury were empowered, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State, to award Sir E. Law, on retirement, a pension not exceeding 700*l.*, subject to the limitation as to service and residence.

Sir E. F. Law's claim to Diplomatic Pension under 32 & 33 Vict., cap. 43.

"With reference to the provisions of the Act, I have to state that Sir E. Law entered the Diplomatic Service and received his first commission on the 9th August, 1887, as Commercial Attaché; was promoted to be Commercial Secretary on the 8th March, 1894; and was continuously employed on active service abroad in the above capacities to the 31st December, 1898. He was appointed a member of the Council of the Governor-General of India on the 29th November, 1899.

"I think it right to state, for your Lordships' information, that Sir E. Law's diplomatic services were of exceptional value, and I strongly recommend the grant to him of an adequate pension of the fourth class from the date when he ceased to draw salary as a member of the Council in India.

"Sir E. Law's salary as Commercial Secretary on the 31st December, 1898, was at the rate of 1,000*l.* a-year, with a rent allowance of 100*l.* a-year, and he was born on the 2nd November, 1846.

"I have, &c.
(Signed) "LANSDOWNE.

"The Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury."

The above letter was referred to the Treasury Solicitor by the following Minute of the Secretary of the Treasury:—

"Lord Desart,

"Sir E. F. Law received his first commission in the Diplomatic Service, as 'Commercial Attaché,' on the 9th August, 1887; he became 'Commercial Secretary' on the 8th March, 1894; and he resigned this appointment as from the 31st December, 1898, having actually served abroad for more than ten years.

"The period of fifteen years which must elapse from the date of his first commission, in order to qualify him for a pension under section 7 of 32 & 33 Vict., cap. 43, expired on the 8th August, 1902, when he had for some time ceased to be a member of the Diplomatic Service; and he has not since been reappointed to that service. Is he now legally qualified for a pension under section 7?

"Please consider the case in connection with your opinion on Sir J. Pauncefote's case (10056/98)—you were then of opinion that the fifteen years must have been completed before the date of final retirement.

"The only other case, so far as I know, in which the same question could have arisen, is that of Sir H. Layard (12666/84), who was recalled from Constantinople in 1880, and to whom a pension was awarded in 1884 without further employment. Probably he did not actually resign; but no other post in the Diplomatic Service was offered to him. His case was referred to the Law Officers, but on another point; and the present question was not raised or noticed in any way.

"January 10, 1906."

The following is a copy of the Minute of the Treasury Solicitor thereon :—

"Sir G. Murray,

"I have again considered the provisions of the Statute of 1869, and can find no reason to alter the opinion I expressed in Lord Pauncefote's case. The application of that opinion to a particular case may be another matter. By final retirement I meant when an officer ceased to belong to the service and the Government had no claim at all on him—that is, when he has ceased to be available for public duties and had become a private and independent individual.

"The resignation of a particular appointment does not, in my judgment, necessarily involve retirement from the Diplomatic Service, and I believe it is, in fact, usual for men in that service to be for considerable periods of time 'en disponibilité' or otherwise available in case of necessity, though they may, in fact, never be again employed. A man in that position might, I think, be granted a pension at the expiration of the period of fifteen years from the date of his first commission if he had complied with the other provisions of the section as to the qualifications for such pension. If my view is the correct one, the question here is one of fact, and I do not consider that the acceptance of an appointment in another service would necessarily involve final retirement from the Diplomatic Service in the sense in which I used it, though there might be circumstances in which it would have that effect. The matter, if it be a doubtful one, is of importance; and it may be that the Foreign Office, if not disposed to accept my opinion, would desire that it should be submitted for the consideration of the Law Officers.

"January 15, 1906."

The following are copies of the letters and Minutes in the case of Sir J. Pauncefote referred to by the Secretary of the Treasury :—

"Foreign Office, June, 17, 1898.

"I am directed by the Marquess of Salisbury to request that you will state to the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, that Sir J. Pauncefote, Her Majesty's Ambassador at Washington, will, in the course of the present year, reach the limit of seventy years of age, but that he has been granted an extension of time until the 2nd April, 1899. As at present arranged, he will then retire from the public service and become eligible for a pension.

"As regards length of service abroad and residence at his post as Ambassador, Sir Julian will, on his retirement, have fulfilled the necessary conditions prescribed by Act of Parliament; but, on the other hand, fifteen years will not have elapsed since the date of his first commission until March 1900. Until this last condition is satisfied, the grant of the highest diplomatic pension seems barred.

"It is presumed, however, that from the date of his retirement in April 1899, Sir Julian might be awarded a pension under section 12 of 'The Superannuation Act, 1859,' calculated on his salary at the date of his leaving the Foreign Office; that when March 1900 is reached this pension might be cancelled, and that, when all the conditions imposed by the Diplomatic Pensions Act have been satisfied, he might be awarded a first class diplomatic pension of 1,700*l.* a-year.

"I am to inquire whether their Lordships see any objection to such a course; and, if not, whether they would be prepared to follow it.

"I am, &c.

(Signed) "F. H. VILLIERS.

"The Secretary to the Treasury."

"Minute of the Treasury to the Treasury Solicitor."

"The Solicitor is requested to advise on the following points :—

"The Diplomatic Pensions Act 32 & 33 Vict., cap. 43, sec. 7 (1) provides that a person shall not be qualified for receiving a pension of any class until the expiration of fifteen years from the date of his first commission.

"Do these words require that the person should be actually serving at the date of the expiration of the fifteen years, or, would he be qualified if, having retired, after fourteen years, he deferred applying for a pension until fifteen years had expired from the date of his first commission?

"Assuming the latter question to be answered in the affirmative, the following question arises in the case of Sir J. Pauncefote.

"He retires on the 22nd April, 1899, and will then be awarded a superannuation allowance under the Act of 1859.

"But in the following April, fifteen years will have expired from the date of his first commission, and he will then, on the assumption made above, become qualified for a larger pension under the Diplomatic Pensions Act.

"If he thereupon resigns his first pension, will the fact that he has received it during the preceding year disqualify him from claiming the second pension from the date on which the conditions of the Diplomatic Pensions Act are fulfilled?

(Signed) "FRANCIS MOWATT.

"June 29, 1898."

"Minute of the Treasury Solicitor in reply to the foregoing Minute.

"Sir F. Mowatt,

"In my opinion, the date from which the fifteen years must be calculated is that of the officer's final retirement from the Diplomatic Service, and that if at the time of that retirement fifteen years have not expired since the date of the first commission he does not become qualified for a pension under 32 & 33 Vict., cap. 43.

"The section does not, as it seems to me, provide that where an officer has only been ten years in the Diplomatic Service he may become qualified for a pension under the Statute, even though such pension cannot be granted to him on his retirement. It would not have been difficult, if that had been the intention, to make it clear in the words of the Act; but such a provision would be inconsistent with the principles on which other pensions are granted, viz., that they are to be based on a period of service calculated up to the date of the officer's retirement from the public service.

"I can find no words in section 7 of the Act which lead me to think that it can be so interpreted, and I am confirmed in my view by the words of section 5, which authorize the Treasury, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State, to grant pensions to persons in Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service, because I do not think it can be said that a person who has retired and left that service can be said to be a person in the service. Even apart from section 5, I should, however, be of opinion that, to entitle an officer to pension, his first commission must have been dated fifteen years prior to the date of his retirement. The effect of a different view may be illustrated by applying it to the circumstances of this particular case. By section 2 of 'The Superannuation Act, 1859,' 22 Vict., cap. 26, superannuation allowance may be granted to persons who have served in an established capacity in the permanent Civil Service of the State, for whom 'provision shall not otherwise have been made by Act of Parliament.' If Sir Julian Pauncefote is entitled in the year 1900 to be awarded a diplomatic pension, he is (although he cannot receive it between 1899 and 1900) a person for whom provision has otherwise been made by Act of Parliament, and thus would be deprived of the benefits of the Superannuation Act of 1859. The result of that would be that a person in his position, although otherwise qualified under sections 2 and 12 of the Superannuation Act of 1859 to superannuation, might be in receipt of no pension at all for, it might be, several years, being a person for whom provision had been made by the Act of 1859, although he had not actually benefited under that Act. He might, indeed, never benefit, if he died before the period had elapsed.

"If, on the other hand, he can be granted a superannuation allowance under the Act of 1859, it must be on the ground that he was not at the time of his retirement a person for whom provision had been made.

"In my view, either he is or is not a person for whom provision has otherwise been made. If he be, he cannot have his pension under the act of 1859. If he is not, one ground on which he gets that pension is that he can receive no pension under any other Act of Parliament; and I do not, as I have said, think he can acquire that privilege after his retirement.

"Assuming that my view is not correct, I should answer your second question in the affirmative; but holding the views I do, that question does not arise.

(Signed) "H. CUFFE.

"Sir,

"I am directed by the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to acquaint you, for the information of the Secretary of State, that they have very carefully considered the points submitted in Mr. Villiers' letter of the 17th ultimo, as affecting the claim to pension of Sir J. Pauncefote, Her Majesty's Ambassador at Washington, under the provisions of the Act 32 & 33 Vict., cap. 43, sec. 7. Their Lordships are advised that the words of the said section 'until the expiration of fifteen years from the date of his first commission' apply to a period ending with the officer's retirement from the service and that if, at the time of that retirement fifteen years have not expired, he cannot subsequently, by the lapse of further time not passed in the service, become qualified.

"In these circumstances, it appears to their Lordships that the only means by which the object in view can be obtained is by Sir Julian's retention in the service till March 1900, at which date it is stated that fifteen years will have expired since he received his first commission.

"I am, &c.
(Signed) "FRANCIS MOWATT.

"The Under-Secretary of State,
Foreign Office."

There are sent herewith for reference the papers in Sir H. Layard's case referred to by the Secretary of the Treasury.

By section 6 of "The Diplomatic Salaries, &c., Act, 1869" (32 & 33 Vict., cap 43), the Secretary of State may grant pensions during life to persons in His Majesty's Diplomatic Service limited in amount and varying according to the class of pension which the officer may be qualified to receive.

The qualifications applicable to all classes of pensions under the section are—

1. That fifteen years must have elapsed since the date of the officer's first commission.
2. That the officer must have served as prescribed in some foreign State or States for a period of ten years.

There is no question in this case as to the second qualification, but, as will have been seen, the point is raised whether an officer who, before the expiration of fifteen years from the date of his first commission, ceased to be a member of the Diplomatic Service either by definite and final retirement or removal, or by resignation of his post, and not having received any further appointment in that service, is qualified for pension.

In Sir J. Pauncefote's case the Treasury, after consulting the Treasury Solicitor, adopted the view that in the case of final retirement prior to the expiration of fifteen years from the date of an officer's first commission he could not by the lapse of time acquire that qualification. The reasons for this view are given in the Treasury Solicitor's Minute and Treasury letter set out above.

That is the main question on which the opinion of the Law Officers is sought—and (assuming the view taken in Sir J. Pauncefote's case to be right) whether an officer who had not been finally removed or finally retired from the service, but had merely resigned his post and not been further employed, could by lapse of time acquire this qualification. The latter point may be a question to a large extent of fact, and be open to decision as a matter of discretion rather than of law. It is, however, one on which the Treasury would desire to know the views of the Law Officers, and also as to the particular case now under the consideration of the Treasury.

The Act of 1869 by section 4 repeals the provision of 2 & 3 Wm. IV, cap. 116, relating to diplomatic salaries and pensions. Those repealed sections in effect authorized a charge upon the Consolidated Fund of a certain sum to defray the charge of, inter alia, pensions granted to persons "having served His Majesty at Foreign Courts," the qualifications to which this case relates being practically the same as under section 7 of the Act of 1869. The effect may be the same, but it is to be noted that whereas the Act of Wm. IV provided for the payment of pensions to persons "having served His Majesty at Foreign Courts," section 6 of the Act of 1869 provides for the grant of pensions to persons "in Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service," while section 5 of the Act of 1869 describes the payments under that Act as salaries, allowances, and pensions payable to persons "in Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service." It is true that a pensioner can hardly be said, strictly speaking, to be in the Diplomatic Service, but still less, as it is submitted, can any one be in the Diplomatic Service who has resigned or been removed at a time anterior to that of the grant of the pension. Further, in this connection, the language of sections 8, 9, and 10 of the Act of 1869 would appear to have some bearing on the point now under consideration. Section 8 provides for the grant of an allowance in case of retirement from infirmity of mind or body to an officer "before the completion of the period which would qualify him for a pension under the other provisions of this Act," and the same language is used in section 9 in the case of retirement by reason of severe bodily injury, which would seem to imply that the qualifying period of fifteen years must be a period of service or liability to service. Further, section 10 provides for the grant of an allowance in the case of interruption of service to an officer "before he has completed the term of service and period of residence which under the provisions of this Act would entitle him to a pension for having served in such capacity." It may, however, be that these words only refer to the service of ten years, and the period of residence in some specified capacity, and not to the period of fifteen years from the date of the first commission.

On the other hand, the Act does not in terms, as it might have done, prescribe as a qualification either an actual service or liability to service of fifteen years (unless the limitation of grants of pensions to persons in the Diplomatic Service has that effect), and the only statutory service specifically required is for a period of ten years; so that, if that is fulfilled and is sufficient, the mere effluxion of time might, if that be the true construction, enable a man who has once been in the service to acquire this qualification for pension, although he did not possess it at the time of his quitting the service.

The above case was sent by the Treasury Solicitor to the Foreign Office for their observations, and the following correspondence has passed:—

"Dear Davidson,

"Treasury, January 20, 1906.

"I have been instructed by the Treasury to submit a Case to the Law Officers on the general question raised in this matter, which is probably known to you, and presumably as to the application of whatever may be the right principle to the particular case of Sir E. Law. I have also (most properly) been instructed to send you the Case for any observations, additions, or amendments you may desire should be inserted on the part of the Foreign Office, so that all proper considerations may be before the Law Officers. This, I am bound to say, I should have done in any case without any instructions from the Treasury, as one knows from experience how difficult it is to satisfy one's self that one has stated impartially a Case on which one has already formed and expressed an opinion. I accordingly inclose the draft Case which I have prepared, in order that you may deal with it as suggested above, and shall be glad to discuss the matter with you at any time that may be convenient to you.

"You will see that I committed myself to an opinion on the point some years ago, from which opinion I am, as at present advised, unable to recede (though of course I quite appreciate that I may well be wrong), and it was because on seeing these papers I formed the impression that the Foreign Office did not altogether accept my view that I suggested to the Treasury the desirability of a reference to the Law Officers.

"Yours very truly,
(Signed) "DESART."

"My dear Desart,

"Foreign Office, February 27, 1906.

"I now 'after many days,' send you back the draft Case on the subject of Sir E. F. Law's pension—with a replica of my opinion in the matter, and a copy of the Minutes which passed between Sir C. Hardinge and myself: you can of course add both to the Case if you like; I also return your letter to me, in case you desire also to embody that and have no copy of it.

"When the Law Officers have given their opinion, I daresay you will kindly let me have a copy of the Case and opinion.

"Ever yours,
(Signed) "W. E. DAVIDSON."

GENERAL.

"Copy of Minutes between the Permanent Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the Legal Adviser."

"Sir C. Hardinge,

"Please see the papers herewith (which explain themselves), and Lord Desart's private letter to me of the 2nd February, 1st paragraph.

"I do not myself think that there is any doubt at all about the matter, but as Desart has already prepared a Case I see no reason why it should not go to the Law Officers, and probably Sir E. F. Law would like to have the benefit of an appeal to them from the opinion of the Divisional Court below.

"However, that is for you to settle. I am quite ready to risk being upset by the Law Officers.

"Legal Adviser,

"I entirely agree with your opinion, of which I think there can be no doubt; but it would perhaps be more conclusive to Sir E. Law if that opinion were confirmed by the Law Officers.

"C. H."

Minute of the Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office.

I so entirely agree both in the conclusions and the reasoning of the Treasury Solicitor's Minute of July 4, 1898, on the case of Sir Julian Pauncefote and of his Minute of January 15, 1906, on the case of Sir Edward Fitzgerald Law, that it appears hardly necessary for me to add anything further, beyond stating my entire concurrence in Lord Desart's views.

The matter is no doubt an important one, and it may on that ground—especially as the Treasury Solicitor has already prepared a "Case" for that purpose—be desirable to submit it to the Law Officers of the Crown.

I cannot, however, say that it appears to me to be doubtful as a matter of law on the construction of the Statute (32 & 33 Vict., cap. 43) that Sir E. Law has not at present fulfilled the conditions entitling him to a pension under that enactment.

The answer to question (1), which is propounded in the draft Case herewith, is, in my opinion, in the negative; and, assuming that this be so, it is unnecessary, so far as the present case of Sir E. F. Law is concerned, to answer the other questions (2 and 3).

(Signed)

February 16, 1906.

The Attorney and Solicitor General are requested to favour the Lords of the Treasury with their opinion:—

1. Whether an officer who has left the Diplomatic Service before the expiration of fifteen years from the date of his first commission can become qualified after final retirement or removal from that service for a pension under the provisions of sections 6 and 7 of 32 & 33 Vict., cap. 43.

2. If not, could an officer who had resigned a particular post in the Diplomatic Service before the expiration of fifteen years from the date of his first commission, and had received no further appointment in that service, become by lapse of time qualified to receive a pension under the provisions of that section?

3. If so, whether Sir E. F. Law is so qualified?

Opinion.

1. The answer to the first question is in the negative. It is, in our opinion, clear that the provisions of sections 6 & 7 of "The Diplomatic Salaries, &c., Act, 1869," are applicable only in favour of members of the Diplomatic Service, and accordingly an officer who has left that service before the expiration of the period of fifteen years mentioned in section 7 (1), cannot be qualified for a pension under the Act.

GENERAL.

2. Yes, if he still remained a member of the Diplomatic Service, although unemployed therein.

3. This depends upon whether Sir E. Law's appointment as a member of the Council of the Governor-General of India was incompatible with his continuing a member of, and necessarily terminated his connection with, the Diplomatic Service, as, for example, if the terms of his appointment were such that he could not properly resign it were he called upon to serve in the Diplomatic Service. This is a question of fact depending upon the Rules of the Service and the terms of Sir E. Law's appointment.

We may add that we agree in all respects with the opinion expressed by Lord Desart.

Law Officers' Department,
March 27, 1906.

Sir,

Treasury Chambers, April 7, 1906.

The Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury have had under consideration Lord Lansdowne's letter of the 27th November last, submitting Sir E. F. Law's claim to a pension under the Act 32 and 33 Vict., cap. 43, in respect of his services as Commercial Attaché and Commercial Secretary.

Sir E. Law resigned the last mentioned office as from the 31st December, 1898, when he had not completed the period of fifteen years which must elapse from the date of his first commission in order to qualify him for a pension under the Act, and my Lords understand that he has not, since that date, been a member of His Majesty's Diplomatic Service.

In these circumstances my Lords are unable, for the reasons given in their letter of the 7th July, 1898, with regard to the case of Lord Pauncefote, to regard Sir E. Law as qualified for a diplomatic pension.

of April 25, 1906.]

From Board of Trade, March 21, 1906, to the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. Rowlatt.

THE Law Officers and Mr. Rowlatt are requested to advise—

1. Whether under Treaty stipulations the subjects of Greece, Japan, and San Salvador can claim to have granted to them a pilotage certificate upon compliance with the provisions of section 599 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894."

2. Whether the subjects of nations with whom a Treaty has been entered into granting most-favoured-nation treatment have also a right to claim the same privileges, &c., as would be granted to subjects of the States mentioned in question No. 1.

3. Whether the rights claimable by subjects of the nations indicated in question No. 2 is an absolute right by reason of the operation of the most-favoured-nation clause, or whether the right is one which is claimable only if and when the subjects of the States mentioned in question No. 1 have claimed and had granted to them the particular privilege now under consideration.

4. Generally upon the case.

As to Treaty right of Aliens to Pilotage
Certificates.

1. We are of opinion that, as the law now stands, the subjects of the countries mentioned can claim to have the certificates in question granted to them upon compliance with the provisions of section 599 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894." The nationality of the candidate for such a certificate is, in our opinion, not a matter which, under the present law, ought to be taken into consideration in deciding upon his case.

There remains the question whether, if the law were altered so as to make foreigners ineligible for these certificates, a breach of the Treaties with these countries would be committed. We are not entirely agreed upon this point.

The Attorney-General and Mr. Rowlatt are of opinion that the Anglo-Greek Treaty of 1886 gives to owners and masters of Greek ships a right of access by navigation to British waters, and that such access must not be encumbered by any condition affecting the ship, whether imposed from the fiscal or from the traffic regulation point of view which national ships can avoid. They do not think that this requires Great Britain to admit foreigners to the exercise of the profession of a pilot in British waters merely because all ships, foreigners included, are obliged to take such pilots; but they regard certificates under section 599 as, in substance, a means whereby ships officered by persons of sufficient competence are exempted from compulsory pilotage, and that to deny this to foreign ships would be a breach of the Treaty.

The Solicitor-General is of opinion that the equality of treatment stipulated for is in respect of fiscal matters only, and that these certificates may rightfully be withheld from foreigners on the ground that the selection of persons to exercise in any way the functions of a pilot is a matter concerning national safety, in respect of which His Majesty's Government ought not to be held to have limited their freedom of action.

2. Yes.

3. This must depend upon the true construction of the particular most-favoured-nation clause upon which it may arise; but, speaking generally, we are of opinion that the right extends to the treatment which the most favoured nation is entitled to, whether actually claimed or not. On the other hand, the treatment accorded in actual practice would be very material upon the construction of the Treaty upon which it depends.

4. In considering what position it is, practically speaking, possible to take up with regard to this question, it is necessary to bear in mind what recently occurred in the case of Sweden. It was held in the "Hanna" L.R., 1, A. and E., 283, and the "Vesta" L.R., 7, P.D., 240, that Swedish vessels were liable to compulsory pilotage in certain cases where British ships were not. This was objected to by Sweden as differential treatment in the matter of "charges" within the meaning of a Treaty of 1826. His Majesty's Government [did not consider that the claim to exemption could be made under the Declaration of 1824, but] promised legislation, and "The Merchant Shipping (Exemption from Compulsory Pilotage) Act, 1897," was passed to repeal the British exemption. It was, moreover, specifically pointed out to the Swedish Government that pilotage certificates were open to Swedish masters on the same terms as to British. It seems to us that it will not now be easy to deny that equality of treatment, such as that provided for in the Anglo-Greek Treaty of 1886, extends both to pilotage generally and to pilotage certificates.

I think, perhaps, I ought to make a somewhat fuller statement of reasons for my Opinion that the pilotage certificates granted to masters of ships may be limited to British subjects only, without any infraction of the most-favoured-nation clause in the Greek Treaty.

Wide as the wording of that clause is, it is, in my opinion, purely fiscal in its scope. Thus the privileges and exemptions which are there stipulated to be given to either contracting party are such as are "enjoyed by native subjects without having to pay any tax or impost greater than those paid by such subjects." It is a clause aimed against differential "taxes or imposts" of a fiscal character; but it has been conclusively decided in the cases of the "Hanna" and the "Vesta" that a charge for compulsory pilotage imposed on a foreign ship, and not on a British ship, is not a "charge" upon vessels within the meaning of Treaties of Commerce. Compulsory pilotage is a regulation instituted for their benefit, and the payment for it is not a tax or impost. In fact, the grant of equivalent privileges, exemptions, &c., is in relation to a different subject-matter than that with which we are concerned in dealing with the national Regulations as to pilotage. This is a view which foreign nations are scarcely in a position to dispute, for, so far as I am aware, none of them will allow a British subject to acquire a pilotage certificate at all. The only difference between us and them in the application of the same principle is that we allow some of our pilots the privilege of being masters of ships, whereas they do not.

It seems to me that we are still bound by the decisions of our own Courts in the "Hanna" and the "Vesta." The correspondence between the British Government and Sweden in reference to these decisions is not before me; but the mere fact of our having deprived our own ships of the exemption from compulsory pilotage in a particular locality complained of by Sweden does not lessen the authority of those decisions in reference to the point of law now involved. If the British Government had thought these decisions wrong, it could, and would, have passed a Statute depriving them of effect. But it preferred to make a concession to Sweden by giving up the benefit of the decisions in a particular case. If the words of the clause in the Greek Treaty were to receive the full and unrestricted meaning which has been given them by my learned colleagues, I do not see why they should not extend so far as to enable a Greek subject to own a British ship. That would clearly be within the literal meaning of the clause, and yet obviously beyond its intended scope. I find, on reference to the Opinions of previous Law Officers (Sir R. Reid, Sir F. Lockwood, and Sir R. Webster) on the claims raised by Sweden, that their view is substantially the same as the view I have above expressed.

PRISONERS OF WAR.

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

THE opinion of the Law Officers is desired on behalf of the Army Council with regard to certain questions arising as to some proposed Regulations for the custody, &c., of prisoners of war.

The following letter was addressed by the Admiralty to the Army Council, dated the 27th November, 1905:—

T. 4766/1905.
Sir,

Admiralty, November 27, 1905.

I am commanded by my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to acquaint you, for the information of the Army Council, that they have had under consideration the question of the custody, maintenance, and treatment of prisoners in the event of a war in which His Majesty's navy is involved.

2. My Lords consider that there is no necessity for the separation of naval from military prisoners, as the same organization can equally deal with both classes; and that their confinement on board ship would only be resorted to for the purposes of transport from the scene of capture to shore prisons at a British port, or under special circumstances as a temporary measure, the use of hulks for their detention being objectionable and not in accordance with modern principles of international law.

war:
proposed

3. My Lords see no difficulty in framing the few Regulations required in respect to prisoners on board ship, but they desire to invite the special attention of the Army Council to the question of their treatment ashore, with a view to obtaining concurrence in the general principles involved, so that the detailed arrangements can be gone into subsequently, if necessary, by a Joint Committee.

4. In view of the fact that in war with a European Power the first strain must fall upon the navy, and would be very severe, it appears to my Lords that the duty of guarding prisoners ashore, whether soldiers or sailors, should be recognized as belonging to the army, and that the arrangements should be such as would admit of quickly relieving the navy of prisoners temporarily in their charge for transit oversea. It is essential at such a time that the services of all naval ranks and ratings should be immediately available for active service with the fleet at sea.

5. It is suggested that on the outbreak of war special prisoners' barracks or camps should be at once provided in suitable situations for the reception of all prisoners, and placed under retired officers of the army, the necessary guards being provided from the army or the police, as may be most convenient. The barracks, &c., should be managed as the Army Council may deem best, under instructions to be drawn up by the War Office.

6. If my Lords' suggestions are concurred in, such Regulations as may be necessary in regard to prisoners on board ship will be drafted by the Admiralty and referred for consideration of the Army Council.

I am, &c.
(Signed) C. I. THOMAS.

The Secretary,
War Office.

The Army Council agreed that there was no necessity for the separation of naval and military prisoners of war, and that the same organization could equally deal with both classes, and were prepared to accept the principle that the duty of guarding prisoners of war, on shore, whether naval or military prisoners, should properly fall on His Majesty's land forces (the incidence of cost for their accommodation, maintenance, &c., being borne by naval and military votes proportionately).

As a result of the late war in South Africa, considerable experience has been gained as to the housing, treatment, and control of prisoners of war, and it was determined to frame Rules and Regulations to be generally applicable on shore. The Regulations that may be necessary on board ship will be drafted by the Admiralty.

A Joint Conference was held at which the War Office, Admiralty, and the Foreign Office (by their Legal Adviser, Mr. Davidson, K.C., C.B.) were represented, and the proposed Rules (copy herewith) were forwarded by the War Office for the consideration of the Judge Advocate-General and the Treasury Solicitor, as appears from the following Minutes:—

Judge Advocate-General,

April 26, 1906.

The inclosed proposed Rules for prisoners of war interned in the United Kingdom are forwarded for any remarks you may deem desirable to make thereon.

2. With reference to Rule 3 and section 8 of The Hague Convention, the Adjutant-General would be glad if you will kindly favour him with your opinion as to whether it is advisable to make provision in the Army Act for the application of that Act to prisoners of war.

3. Will you also kindly favour the Adjutant-General with your opinion as to whether the application of Rule 18, or of these Rules generally, can be brought into operation in the United Kingdom, or in British territory elsewhere, without coming into conflict with municipal or other law?

(Signed) W. E. FRANKLYN,

18.

D. P. Services,

These Rules are founded on the Rules of The Hague Convention, and are generally in harmony with the laws of this country.

2. In order to bring prisoners of war within the provisions of the Army Act, it will be necessary to amend the Act in that respect.

3. Although it is a recognized rule of the laws and customs of war, is justified within the areas of martial law, and, it may be, in the theatre of war, that a prisoner of war may be shot or otherwise killed in attempting to escape, I can find no authority for the justification of the homicide in the laws of the United Kingdom if committed in this country.*

So far as the Rules affect the putting down of organized disturbances by force of arms, I am of opinion that if the authority is exercised with discretion it will be within the law. I think these questions ought to be submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown.

(Signed) T. MILVAIN,

May 1, 1906.

C. 2,

In view of the opinion of the Judge Advocate-General above, will you please refer the two questions in paragraphs 2 and 3 of Minute 17 for the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown?

(Signed) W. E. FRANKLYN,

Treasury Solicitor,

We have been at some pains to discover the authority for the Regulations governing the internment of prisoners of war in this country during the Napoleonic wars and the Crimean, the latter war being the last occasion on which prisoners were confined in this country. We have traced the Regulations in a Report of a Committee of the House of Commons printed in 1798. These Rules were issued by the Transport Department (a branch of the Admiralty), but do not appear to be based on any statutory authority. It is probable that these Rules governed the treatment of the Russian prisoners in 1854, but no definite evidence to this effect can be produced. Under any circumstances there was no statute on the point. During the South African war prisoners of war were interned in Bermuda, Ceylon, St. Helena, and India under martial law declared by Order in Council.

We have also inquired as to the Regulations in France and Germany. It appears that prisoners of war are in France regarded as subject to martial law, and in Germany as subject to the Laws and Ordinances of the locality in which they may be interned, particularly to the Regulations issued to the troops of the State in question, so that in neither country is there any specific statute to govern prisoners of war.

The question now raised is whether it is expedient to depart from our own custom prevailing hitherto and from that of the two leading European Powers, and provide specifically by statute in the Army Act for the provision of prisoners of war.

(Signed) B. B. CUBITT

May 28, 1906.

P.S.—We found in the Annual Register a case of an inquest on a French prisoner of war shot while endeavouring to escape from Dartmoor, in which the jury returned a verdict of justifiable homicide.

* See Coroner's jury case referred to in Minute No. 20.

It will be seen that, on the advice of the Judge Advocate-General, the opinion of the Law Officers is desired on the questions mentioned in paragraphs 2 and 3 of General Franklyn's Minute of the 26th April, 1906.

The Law Officers are referred to "The Laws and Customs of War on Land," by Professor Holland, K.C., an official publication for the use of the army; section 8 of The Hague Convention (mentioned in General Franklyn's Minute of the 26th April, 1906) is reproduced in Article 32, p. 12.

The questions raised by the Director of Personal Services and the Judge Advocate-General go to the general position of prisoners of war in regard to the municipal laws of England or any other portion of the British dominions in which they may be confined.

It is apprehended that there can be no serious question as to the legality, according to the municipal law of England, of the custody by the Crown of prisoners of war. See the cases R. v. Schiever, 2 Burr., 765 (1759), the three Spanish sailors, 2 W. Bl., 1324 (1780), and Furly v. Newnham, 2 Dougl., 419 (1780), in all of which a habeas corpus applied for on behalf of prisoners of war was refused; see also the Act 52 Geo. III, cap. 156, making the offence of assisting prisoners of war to escape one punishable with transportation. Any other condition of the law would be an intolerable absurdity, and of course, as a matter of history, prisoners of war were kept in large numbers in this country during the Napoleonic and Crimean wars, and in various parts of the Empire, such as Bermuda, St. Helena, Ceylon, and British India during the Boer war. The principle of law to which this power of the Crown may be referred is perhaps that principle which recognizes that an act of State—i.e., the acts of the Crown as representing this country towards an alien State—are not cognizable in any Municipal Court of Law; in illustration of this the Law Officers may be referred (among many other cases) to the case of Buron v. Denman, 2 Exch., 167 (an act of war by the Commander of a man-of-war), and to two recent cases of Cook v. Sprigg, 1899, A.C., 572, and Salaman v. Secretary of State for India, 1906, 1 K.B., 613.

It is submitted that the custody of prisoners of war is in fact part of the operations of the war, whether it be carried out in a foreign country or in British dominions at home or abroad, and in the treatment of prisoners of war the Crown is only controlled by international Treaty or custom, and that no legislation is required in any part of the British Empire to legalize such custody or any Regulations that may be made by the Crown.

The Law Officers are referred to a case laid before their predecessors in 1901 and to their opinion of the 28th January, 1901, affirming the legality of the custody of Boer prisoners of war in Ceylon.

It is submitted also that this power of the Crown must extend during such reasonable period after the actual cessation of the war as may be necessary for the repatriation of the prisoners.

Reference may also be made to the well-known rule that an alien enemy has no rights in British Courts during the war (see Brandon v. Nesbitt, 6 T. R., 23), and to certain cases which have arisen as to the right of a prisoner of war to sue on contracts made by him during his captivity, with the licence of the Crown, namely, Sparenburgh v. Bannatyne, 1 Bos. and Pul., 170 (1797), and Maria v. Hall, 1 Taunt., 33, &c. The particular question at issue in these cases may not be material, but there are passages throwing some light on the general position of prisoners of war, e.g., per Eyre, C.J., 1 Bos. and Pul., p. 775, "He is in the hands of the King till he is ransomed, or set at liberty by the King's command;" per Keith, J., ib., p. 779, "His body is at the King's disposal." It would also appear that a prisoner of war is liable to the ordinary law for criminal offences (see case in note (p. 778) of an indictment of a prisoner of war for stealing), and also that criminal offences, e.g., murder committed against a prisoner of war, are indictable; and in Maria v. Hall, in the argument, a case is cited of an indictment for murdering a prisoner of war. The case of R. v. Depardo, 1 Taunt., 26 (1807), implies throughout that a prisoner of war can be indicted for crime committed in England.

With regard to the case, e.g., of the murder of a prisoner of war, this would not arise in the case of his execution by his custodians under the authority of the Crown, which would be, in accordance with the principle above suggested, "an act of war." The case of Exp. Marais, 1902, A.C., 109, is merely mentioned for the purpose of distinguishing it; that deals with the right of the Crown against its own subjects and proceeds on a different principle; the existence in the place of custody of the circumstances justifying a general application of martial force is clearly not necessary to the legality of the custody of prisoners of war.

(which was exercised in the Russo-Japanese war in the case of the officers and crews of a Russian man-of-war which took refuge at Hong Kong) would seem to rest on the same basis as the right of the Crown over prisoners of war.

Turning to the questions specifically asked in General Franklyn's Minute, the proposal to make the Army Act applicable to prisoners of war appears to be suggested by Article 32 of Professor Holland's book. There may be some doubt as to the exact meaning of the first paragraph of that provision; possibly it may have been intended, primarily, to refer to the treatment of prisoners in the actual theatre of war. However that may be, it is clear that prisoners of war can be subject to the laws, &c., in force of the army of the capturing State only so far as applicable to their peculiar position. Part I of the Army Act, to which the proposal must (in substance) be confined, is inapplicable in many respects to prisoners of war; it constitutes many offences which prisoners of war cannot commit (see, e.g., among many other provisions, sections 4, 5, and 6), and the punishments vary according to whether the troops are "on active service" or not, and include long terms of imprisonment, which could hardly be enforced against prisoners of war except for ordinary offences against the criminal law of the country.

The constitution of courts-martial would also require serious consideration. But it is hardly necessary to labour the point that a wholesale application of the Army Act—or Part I thereof—to prisoners of war would be quite impracticable. It would seem necessary that a Special Code, following the lines of the Army Act so far as applicable, should be prepared for dealing with disciplinary and other offences by prisoners of war.

With regard to the question put in paragraph 3 of General Franklyn's Minute of the 26th April, 1906 (as to which see especially paragraphs 3, 5, 13, 17, and 18 of the draft Rules), if the view suggested above is correct, there is no restriction imposed by municipal law upon the Crown in its custody and control of prisoners of war; and it would appear (in reference to paragraph 3 of the Judge Advocate-General's Minute of the 1st May, 1906) that the killing of a prisoner of war under the orders and Regulations laid down by the Crown would not be cognizable in any municipal Court in the British Empire.

It is submitted, therefore, that no statutory enactment is necessary to give the necessary powers over prisoners of war; should, however, any such enactment be thought desirable, it should not, it is suggested, go beyond giving a general power to the Crown to make Regulations having statutory effect.

The draft Rules may raise various questions for consideration, but points of detail will be more conveniently considered when the opinion of the Law Officers has been obtained on the general questions which have been raised.

It may perhaps be worth observing that, should it be desired to make Regulations binding on British civilian subjects as regards their dealings with prisoners of war, special statutory powers appear to be necessary, except so far as the place of custody may (in the United Kingdom and elsewhere where similar enactments exist) be capable of regulation by bye-laws under the Military Lands Acts, or by the ordinary rights of the Crown as owner of the land.

Prints of a Memorandum dealing with general questions with regard to prisoners during the South African war, and of certain reports with regard to the Boer prisoners at St. Helena, Bermuda, Ceylon, and British India, are forwarded for the general information of the Law Officers, particular attention being called to the general regulations and orders that were found necessary in these cases.

The Law Officers are requested to Advise—

1. Whether it is advisable to make provisions in the Army Act for the application of that Act to prisoners of war.
2. Whether the proposed Rules can be brought into operation in the United Kingdom or elsewhere in the British dominions without legislation.
3. Generally.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, November 20, 1906.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to inform you that the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury have recently sanctioned the adoption of certain changes in the existing Tables of Fees levied by His Majesty's Consular officers under the authority of the three Orders in Council of which copies are inclosed, viz. :—

Consular Fees
(General, China, &c.)
Orders in Council.
Drafts of

- "The Consular Fees (General) Order in Council, 1892";
- "The Japan (Consular and Marriage Fees) Order in Council, 1900;" and
- "The China and Corea (Consular and Marriage Fees) Order in Council, 1904."

It has consequently become necessary that fresh Orders in Council should be issued repealing these three Orders, and establishing the revised Tables of Fees.

I am therefore to transmit to you the accompanying draft Orders in Council which have been prepared for this purpose, viz. :—

- "The Consular Fees (General) Order in Council, 1906";
- "The China and Corea (Consular and Marriage Fees) Order in Council, 1906"; and
- "The Japan (Consular and Marriage Fees) Order in Council, 1906."

A copy of "The China and Corea (Shipping Registry) Order in Council, 1904," which is referred to in the draft Order relating to China and Corea, is also inclosed for convenience of reference.

As it is important that these Orders should come into force on the 1st January next, Sir E. Grey will be obliged if you will take the draft Orders in Council into your consideration, and will favour him, at your early convenience, with your opinion as to whether the terms of these Orders are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

British steam-ship
"Briardale," at Genoa.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 16, 1906.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit, for your consideration, the papers noted in the accompanying list relating to the detention of the British steam-ship "Briardale" at Genoa.

The facts of the case may be briefly summarized as follows:—

The "Briardale" is a British steam-ship, 5,000 tons, registered at Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

Her late managing owner was Mr. G. H. Elder, and her present managing owner is Sir J. D. Milburn.

Mr. Elder was adjudged a bankrupt at the Newcastle County Court on the 13th March, 1905, and Mr. W. Swan was appointed Trustee under his bankruptcy.

At the time of the bankruptcy 28/64th shares were registered in Mr. Elder's name, but as they were subject to certain registered mortgages he had ceased to have any saleable interest in the ship.

On the 16th June, 1902, Mr. Elder had mortgaged twenty of these shares to the York City and County Bank, and on the 21st January, 1904, he mortgaged four more of the remainder to the bank to secure his current account.

These mortgages were duly registered by the bank at the custom-house on the 22nd January, 1904.

Mr. Elder had previously mortgaged four other shares to Messrs. Pickard to secure advances, and these mortgages were also duly registered in January 1904, and the whole of his original 28/64th shares were therefore subject to mortgages, as above mentioned.

The full value of the "Briardale" is estimated not to exceed 20,000*l*.

At the time of Elder's bankruptcy the "Briardale" was discharging a cargo at Genoa, and on the 16th March, 1905, she was arrested at the suits of Mr. Henry Coe, Mr. H. Trumpy, and Lertora Brothers (three separate parties), of whom only the first-named was a British subject.

The contention advanced by these gentlemen was that Mr. Elder had sold to each of them, for 523*l*, one share in the "Briardale." Messrs. Lertora's total claim, however, is for 3,768*l*. 13*s*. 11*d*., the amount being made up of claims against other vessels managed by Mr. Elder as well as of various personal claims, none of which has any connection with the "Briardale" whatever.

Messrs. Lertora have never been able to produce any bill of sale, while those produced by the other claimants were never registered.

The case came before the Court several times in April, but the Court persisted in reserving their judgment.

On the 12th May, 1905, as the delay still continued, and the detention of the ship was involving the mortgagees in enormous losses, their agent at Genoa offered to give bail to the amount of 6,000*l*., being a little more than the claim of the three claimants, to answer any claims that might be held to be good against the "Briardale."

The claimants, however, refused to accept any bail unless it were made to attach to any claim they might succeed in establishing against Mr. Elder's bankrupt estate as a whole. These conditions were clearly unacceptable to the mortgagees.

The case was not brought to the notice of the Foreign Office until the 14th June, some three months after the arrest of the vessel, and after the litigation had already been in progress in the Italian Courts. Messrs. Ingledew and Fenwick, acting on behalf of the mortgagees, then asked for the intervention of His Majesty's Government in obtaining the release of the vessel. In the first place His Majesty's Embassy was instructed to make unofficial representations, but without result.

After a careful reconsideration of the case, the conclusion was come to that the action of the Italian Courts in taking cognizance of the suit from the outset was entirely opposed to international practice, and it was decided, apart from the individual interests involved, to make strong official representations to the Italian Government on the ground that the conflict of jurisdiction was a matter of the greatest importance to the general shipping community of the country. The necessary instructions, to which reference will be made later, were sent to His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Rome, who addressed a note to the Italian Government on the 27th September last.

No reply was received to this note until the 11th November, when the Italian Government merely referred to the fact that the Court had authorized the release of the ship upon the master of the "Briardale" giving bail on certain conditions, and that as the master refused to agree to the conditions imposed by the Court (which it will be remembered were quite unacceptable) the responsibility for the further detention of the vessel rested with him.

This reply being entirely unsatisfactory, a further note was addressed to the Italian Government on the 17th November, in which it was pointed out that the question of the bail, although the conditions imposed with regard to it were in themselves clearly open to objection, was no more than a side issue, and that the essence of our representations was the far larger plea, viz., the conflict of jurisdiction.

The official reply to this note, which was only received by the Ambassador on the 27th ultimo, maintains:—

1. The impossibility of intervention on the part of the Italian Government while the case is still sub judice.
2. Their inability to understand on what basis of law or International Agreement the statement rests that the Italian judicial authorities are incompetent to take cognizance of a case referring to a foreign merchant-vessel in Italian waters.

The notes by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Marine, which are inclosed in the note of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, seem to show that those Ministers do not understand or, at any rate, fully appreciate the contention put forward by His Majesty's Ambassador.

On the 7th December the case came on again for hearing, and the result was so far satisfactory that Mr. Trumpy and Mr. Coe were non-suited and condemned to pay half costs, but they were absolved from liability to damage for the detention of the ship. Messrs. Lertora's claim was reduced to 1,023*l*. 8*s*. 9*d*., but as to these items further proof was allowed. Bail has again been offered for the reduced amount, but the conditions imposed by the Court are that the bail shall be subject to any claims that Messrs. Lertora may make good as against Elder in his capacity as manager, after his interest in the "Briardale" has ceased.

Three separate appeals, viz.:—

1. The appeal of the owners against the condition of the bail.
2. An appeal by Lertora Brothers against the reduction of their claim.
3. An appeal by Mr. Coe and Mr. Trumpy against the decision of the Court to non-suit them on the ground that the bills of sale produced by them were never registered, were lodged, and the Court, after hearing the pleadings on the 2nd and 3rd ultimo, reserved judgment. It is not expected that the decision will be announced for another fortnight or three weeks.

I am to invite your special attention to the instructions issued to His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Rome, on the 21st September last, to which reference has already been made. The line of policy indicated therein is based on the fact that under the provisions of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," no person not being a British subject can own a British ship or shares, therein. Ships or shares which become the property of an alien (except by transmission by death or marriage, in which case the interests are sold by the Court) become forfeited to the Crown, consequently any attempt to register the bills of sale to Mr. Trumpy and Messrs. Lertora would have led to proceedings for the forfeiture to the Crown of their two shares. The share sold to Coe was never registered in his name, and he has, therefore, legally no right in the ship.

It is stated on behalf of the "Briardale" that no sums are owing to Messrs. Lertora for services rendered to that vessel (see letter of the 16th December, 1905, by Messrs. Bruna inclosed in Messrs. Ingledew and Fenwick's letter of the 4th January, 1906), and, therefore, the only ground on which they, or Mr. Trumpy or Mr. Coe, can be entitled to take proceedings against the vessel, is that they own a share, or shares, in the ship—whether they claim under the abortive bills of sale, or merely as creditors of Elder is immaterial for the present argument; consequently the suits are in reality suits for the possession of the ship or of shares therein.

Sir E. Grey is advised that the rule of the Admiralty Court in this country is to decline to entertain suits as to the possession or ownership of a foreign ship in British waters unless the suit is brought by consent of the parties or with the approval of the Consul of that particular country; and there would appear to be good grounds for objecting to the Italian Courts entertaining a suit for possession of a British ship in the converse case. The rights of Mr. Coe, Mr. Trumpy, and Lertora Brothers to the ship or any shares in her as against either the registered mortgagees on the one hand, or the receiver of Elder's bankrupt estate on the other hand, must depend on the provisions of English law, and "the Court . . . will not be instrumental in depriving foreigners of rights to which they may be entitled by the law of their own country" (Williams and Bruce's "Admiralty Practice" (?), 3rd edition, p. 24).

With regard to the question of bail, the Secretary of State is advised that the course of Admiralty practice in this country is that when a vessel has been arrested for the purposes of a suit, bail is put in and the ship is released. The bail is merely the substitution of one form of security for another, and the object of this substitution is to enable the ship to be employed and to continue to earn money. The liability of the bail, therefore, cannot extend beyond the liability of the ship.

It seems from the papers, however, that the Italian Courts have declined up till now to allow the "Briardale" to be released on bail unless the sureties make themselves responsible for the sums owed to Coe, Trumpy, and Lertora Brothers by the bankrupt Elder, i.e., for debts which cannot be enforced against the "Briardale"; the net result of this is that they would escape from the superior title of the registered mortgagees of Elder's shares, and also from the operation of Elder's bankruptcy in England, in which Coe and Trumpy have already lodged proofs.

The parties have naturally declined altogether to give any such bail, and the ship has now remained under arrest for over twelve months.

In normal circumstances no case for diplomatic intervention arises until all legal remedies have been exhausted, but for the reasons indicated above the Marquess of Lansdowne, then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, considered that he was justified in approaching the Italian Government on the subject without waiting for the conclusion of the litigation.

This opinion is shared by Sir E. Grey, but in view of the very serious losses which are being inflicted on the owners of the "Briardale" by her continued detention at Genoa, and the probability of questions being asked in Parliament on the subject, he desires to learn whether you consider the attitude adopted by him and by his predecessor to be correct, and whether you can suggest any other grounds on which he can again approach the Italian Government.

He will at the same time be glad to be favoured, for his assistance in dealing with the case, with any observations of a general nature which you may have to offer on the papers.

I have, &c.

Report.

The attitude adopted in this case by your Department has not, we think, been based upon correct grounds, but the case does, in our opinion, give rise to matters upon which you can approach the Italian Government, and which may properly be made the subject of diplomatic representation to them.

In our opinion the proceedings in Italy were not suits for the possession of the ship or of shares therein, although if they had been of that nature we could not concur in the view that the Italian Courts would necessarily have had no jurisdiction in the matter. The ship being in Italian waters the jurisdiction of the Italian Courts in relation to it depends upon Italian law, and we entertain no doubt that the Italian Courts would have jurisdiction to cause a foreign ship in Italian waters to be arrested in respect (inter alia) of claims against that ship, as distinguished from mere personal claims against an alleged part owner of the ship. The original proceedings in Italy were undoubtedly founded purely upon claims of the latter character, that is to say, they were merely claims by personal creditors of Mr. Elder; but the judgment of the 30th November 1905, of the Civil Tribunal at Genoa, while asserting the right, according to Italian law, of a personal creditor of one of a number of shareholders in a ship to arrest the whole ship, rejected those claims on the ground that Mr. Elder's interest was disposed of by way of mortgage. It accordingly limited the case of the foreign plaintiffs to claims against the ship as distinguished from personal claims against Mr. Elder, and while the right asserted by the judgment is, in our opinion, one that if it exists raises a question of grave importance to British shipping interests, the effect of the judgment was not open to any objection. It is true that the Court postponed the question of giving bail upon the basis of the judgment until after the hearing of an appeal, but we are unable to say that that fact alone would be sufficient to justify diplomatic intervention. The question that calls, in our opinion, for representation to the Italian Government on the part of your Department arises by reason of the extent of the right to arrest a ship alleged to exist according to Italian law.

The judgment of the Court of Appeal in Genoa appears to establish—concurring in this respect with that of the Civil Tribunal, while dissenting from that judgment's view of Mr. Elder's position as a mortgagor—that a mere personal creditor of an owner of a share in a ship is entitled to arrest the share of his debtor, and for that purpose to have the whole ship arrested by the Court pending the determination of his personal claim. If this judgment be correct, it would necessarily follow that bail to release the ship would have to be in respect of the debtor's alleged interest in the ship, and not merely in respect of claims against the ship, and that accordingly the conditions actually imposed as regards bail would not be open to objection in point of law. If Italian law gives the Courts in Italy such a jurisdiction, and even if in addition it enables them in such circumstances to order a sale of the ship to satisfy the claim, we cannot say that they may not properly exercise it in regard to foreign ships in Italian waters; but it is undoubtedly a jurisdiction that would subject such ships to a most dangerous and uncertain liability, and, if it exists, would tend to seriously prejudice the commercial relations between this country and Italy. It is certainly not a jurisdiction that could be exercised by the Court in this country, and, in our opinion, you may properly represent to the Italian Government the serious effect that would be produced in the commercial relations between the two countries if Italian law entitles a creditor, or alleged creditor, of a shareholder in a British ship as distinguished from a person having a claim against the ship itself, either to arrest or dispose of the ship. We have not failed to observe that in this case Mr. Elder as a mortgagor had, according to the law of England, no interest in the ship available for his creditors, but, while having regard to that fact, it may be well in any representations made to the Italian Government not to treat Mr. Elder as a shareholder—the erroneous decision of the Court of Appeal upon this point is not in itself a matter upon which diplomatic intervention could be based.

We may add that, whatever be the correct view as to the right of arrest in Italy, the judgment of the Court of Appeal appears to be erroneous, having regard to Mr. Elder's position as a mortgagor, and the case would accordingly appear to be a proper one for appeal to the Court of Cassation, both on that ground and upon the question of the right of arrest.

I have the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th ultimo, in which you furnish him with your Report on the case of the steam-ship "Briardale."

I am now to transmit to you the draft of a despatch which Sir E. Grey proposes to address to His Majesty's Ambassador at Rome, instructing his Excellency to make representations to the Italian Government in the sense indicated in your letter, and also the draft of letters to be addressed to the firms and other interested persons who have been in communication with this Department in regard to the case.

I am to inquire whether you concur in the terms of these drafts.

Law Officers' Department,

Draft of Despatch from Sir Edward Grey to Sir E. Egerton.

(No. 22. Consular.)

Sir,

Foreign Office, May 1906.

With reference to previous correspondence on the subject of the arrest and detention at Genoa of the steam-ship "Briardale," I transmit, for your Excellency's confidential information, a copy of the opinion furnished by the Law Officers of the Crown on the case.

Your Excellency will observe that the Law Officers do not concur in the view hitherto held in this Department, which was that the suit was one for the possession of a British ship, and that the Italian Courts had therefore no jurisdiction in the matter. The Law Officers hold that the Italian Courts have jurisdiction in respect of claims against the ship, as distinguished from mere personal claims against an alleged part owner of the ship, and, although the original proceedings were founded on claims against Mr. Elder of the latter nature, the judgment given by the Civil Tribunal at Genoa on the 30th November rejected those claims, on the ground that Mr. Elder's interest was disposed of by way of mortgage, and limited the case to claims against the ship.

But while the effect of the judgment is was not (so long as it stood), in the opinion of the Law Officers, open to objection, the judgment did raise a question of grave importance to British shipping, in that it asserted the right, according to Italian law, of a personal creditor of one of a number of shareholders in a ship to arrest the whole ship.

If this assertion, in which the Italian Court of Appeal concurred, and on which it acted, be correct, it would necessarily follow that bail to release the ship would have to be in respect of the debtor's alleged interest in the ship, and not merely in respect of claims against the ship, and that, accordingly, the conditions actually imposed as regards bail would not be open to objection in point of law.

If Italian law gives Courts in Italy such a jurisdiction, and even if in addition, it enables them in such circumstances to order a sale of the ship to satisfy the claim, the Law Officers are not prepared to say that the Courts may not properly exercise it in regard to foreign ships in Italian waters; but it is undoubtedly a jurisdiction which would subject such ships to a most dangerous and uncertain liability, and would tend seriously to prejudice the commercial relations between this country and Italy. It is certainly not a jurisdiction that could be exercised by the Court in this country.

The Law Officers also state that they consider the decision of the Court of Appeal in regard to Mr. Elder's continued interest in the ship to be erroneous, but this is not a matter upon which diplomatic intervention could be based.

I request your Excellency to ask for an interview with the Minister for Foreign Affairs at the earliest possible moment, and represent to him that, if the decision is confirmed, that Italian law entitles a creditor or an alleged creditor of a shareholder in a British ship, as distinguished from a person having a claim against the ship itself, either to arrest or dispose of the ship, the effect on the commercial relations between the two countries, which have hitherto been so amicable, is likely to be immediate and disastrous.

I shall myself make a similar communication to the Italian Ambassador at this Court.

Draft of Letter from Foreign Office to Messrs. Ingledew and Fenwick†

Gentlemen,

Sir,

Foreign Office, May 1906.

As you are aware, His Majesty's Government have given the closest consideration to the case of the steam-ship "Briardale," now detained at Genoa, and I am directed by Secretary Sir E. Grey to inform you of the opinion at which they have arrived as to the main facts of the case, and as to the representations which must be made to the Italian Government.

Sir E. Grey is advised that as the case was limited by the decision of the 30th November of the Civil Tribunal at Genoa to alleged claims against the ship, as distinguished from personal claims against Mr. Elder, that judgment in effect was not open to objection, and that in any view the jurisdiction of the Italian Courts over a ship in Italian waters is not open to dispute. He is further advised that the suit cannot be considered as one for possession of a British ship. But the assertion of the Civil Tribunal, confirmed and acted upon by the Court of Appeal, that a mere personal creditor of an owner of a share in a ship is entitled to arrest the share of his debtor, and for that purpose to have the whole ship arrested by the Court pending the determination of his personal claim, involves a most dangerous principle.

* Alterations printed in italics.

† Identical letters were addressed to Messrs. Wilkinson and Marshall, Mr. T. Cairns, M.P., and Mr. D. Pickard, with the addition of the two paragraphs at the end to Mr. Pickard only.

His Majesty's Government will take prompt steps to warn the Italian Government that, if this decision be confirmed, the effect upon the commercial relations between the two countries will be immediate and most prejudicial.

With regard to the decision of the Court of Appeal respecting Mr. Elder's continued interest in the ship, Sir E. Grey is advised that that decision is probably erroneous, and that the case would accordingly appear to be a proper one for appeal to the Court of Cassation both on that ground and upon the question of the right of arrest.

I am, &c.

To Mr. D. Pickard only:—

I have just received your letter of the 22nd. I do not think that it can be said that there has been anything in the nature of unreasonable delay in this case.

It was absolutely necessary in the interests of the parties concerned to obtain the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in the matter. The Law Officers found that the case involved extremely complicated legal issues, and naturally were not prepared to give an opinion without having had a reasonable period for consideration. In these circumstances, I regret that you should not have appreciated the fact that some little time would necessarily elapse before any action could be taken by His Majesty's Government in the matter.

Gentlemen, Foreign Office, December 20, 1905.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list, which relate to the seizure and detention of the steam-ship "Lincluden," the property of the Lincluden Steam-ship Company, by a Japanese war-ship on the 16th May last, in respect of which a claim has been put forward by the owners against the Japanese Government.

The "Lincluden" was on a voyage from Nicolaief to Vladivostok with a cargo of barley. She left the former port on the 28th January, 1905, but, on her arrival at Woosung on the 12th May, received orders from the owner to proceed to Kobe and there to discharge her cargo. While on her voyage to the latter port she was seized by the Japanese war-ship "Sado Maru" on the 16th May on suspicion of carrying contraband of war.

The "Lincluden" was taken in for adjudication in due course, and it will be observed from the judgment of the Sasebo Prize Court, dated the 21st May (Paper C) that, while the Court held that the action of the "Sado Maru" in seizing the vessel was justified, inasmuch as the evidence was not sufficient to determine the fact that the steamer had actually changed her port of destination, it nevertheless decided that there was no doubt that Kobe was her true objective, and released the vessel.

The owners of the "Lincluden" have now presented a claim to this Department amounting to 493*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*, the principal item of which is a charge for six days' detention at the rate of 6*d.* per gross registered ton per day, amounting to 411*l.* 18*s.* It appears, however, to Sir E. Grey that the sum claimed for demurrage is excessive, having regard to the fact that the proceedings of the steamer warranted her detention by the Japanese authorities, and that in a letter from the Customs, dated the 18th March last (Paper A), the name of the "Lincluden" appears in a list of vessels suspected of being in attendance upon the Russian fleet. In the event, therefore, of the claim being put forward, Sir E. Grey proposes to inform the owners that the rate of demurrage must be reduced from 6*d.* to 4*d.* per gross ton.

The main question of principle underlying this claim is whether His Majesty's with Russia.

Government are entitled to demand compensation in a case in which the circumstances amply justified the seizure of a vessel and the subsequent proceedings before a Prize Court, but in which, after investigation of the case, no grounds for condemnation were found to exist. Sir E. Grey, as at present advised, is inclined to think that any neutral State is at liberty to ask for compensation from a belligerent State in such circumstances, and that, consequently, the claim of the owners of the "Lincluden" should be put forward by His Majesty's Government.

I am to request that you will take the inclosed papers into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to whether, having regard to all the circumstances attending upon the seizure of the "Lincluden," the case is one in which His Majesty's Government can properly ask the Japanese Government to pay compensation.

Sir E. Grey would also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer upon the papers now submitted to you.

Report.

Having regard to the fact, found by the Prize Court and admitted by the British Government, that there were reasonable grounds for the seizure of the "Lincluden" and for the subsequent proceedings before the Prize Court, a claim for compensation for detention cannot, in our opinion, be sustained.

There is no doubt that if a belligerent interrupts the voyage of a neutral vessel by taking it before a Prize Court for adjudication the captor must justify his conduct by proving that some circumstances existed in connexion with the ship or cargo affording reasonable ground for the belief that one or both may prove on further inquiry to be lawful prize. If the captor cannot give such proof, he is liable to pay costs and damages to the neutral vessel.

We can, however, find no sufficient authority for the suggestion that where the search and subsequent proceedings have resulted in a decree for the restitution of the neutral vessel the latter is entitled—on that fact alone—to recover damages for the detention from the captor or his Government. There is one case (Salucci v. Johnson, 4 Douglas 224 A.D. 1785), which may perhaps be cited as an authority for the proposition that the searcher acts at his peril and pays costs or damages unless he finds something on board to justify him, but that case is not treated as an authority in subsequent cases, and the later authorities proceed on the principle that the owner of the neutral vessel has no remedy for loss of voyage or for other injury occasioned by the reasonable exercise of the right of search.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

*Foreign Office, April 2, 1906.*Award in Japanese
House Tax
Arbitration:
Reading of Bearing of Treaties.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you the accompanying papers in connection with a Memorandum that has been drawn up in Paris by Agents of the British, French, and German Governments as to the interpretation to be placed on the Award pronounced at The Hague on the 22nd May, 1905, in the Japanese House Tax Arbitration between Great Britain, France, and Germany on the one side, and Japan on the other, and the results that follow from such Award.

The point at issue in this Arbitration was whether the Japanese Government were entitled to impose taxation on the houses belonging to the land-renters in the former foreign Settlements in Japan.

Questions in connection with this Arbitration have already been referred to your predecessors on the 11th September, 1901, on the 11th August, 1903, on the 9th December, 1903, and on the 21st April, 1904 (Papers A, B, and C).

The case turned upon Article XVIII of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty of 1894 and the corresponding portions of the French and German Treaties under which the Powers surrendered their rights of extra-territorial jurisdiction in Japan. Article XVIII provided as follows:—

"Her Britannic Majesty's Government, so far as they are concerned, give their consent to the following arrangement:—

"The several foreign Settlements in Japan shall be incorporated with the respective Japanese Communes, and shall thenceforth form part of the general municipal system of Japan.

"The competent Japanese authorities shall thereupon assume all municipal obligations and duties in respect thereof, and the common funds and property, if any, belonging to such Settlements shall at the same time be transferred to the said Japanese authorities.

"When such incorporation takes place, the existing leases in perpetuity under which property is now held in the said Settlements shall be confirmed, and no conditions whatsoever other than those contained in such existing leases shall be imposed in respect of such property. It is, however, understood that the Consular authorities mentioned in the same are in all cases to be replaced by the Japanese authorities.

"All lands which may previously have been granted by the Japanese Government free of rent for the public purposes of the said Settlements shall, subject to the right of eminent domain, be permanently reserved free of all taxes and charges for the public purposes for which they were originally set apart."

The contention of the Japanese Government was that, in accordance with Japanese law, they were entitled for all fiscal purposes to separate the land from the buildings standing on it, and to limit the privileges given by Article XVIII to the land, as it was only the land that was held under the lease, the houses having been erected by, and being the actual property of, the lessee.

The arbitration which was agreed to for the settlement of the dispute, involved a close investigation of the origin and nature of the privileges of the land-renters and the status which they had enjoyed up to 1899, the date when the Treaty concluded in 1894 came into force. Voluminous cases ("Mémoires") and counter-cases were prepared on both sides. The "Mémoire" and the "Contre-Mémoire" which had been prepared in Paris by the Agents of the three Powers were submitted to your predecessors on the 9th December, 1903, and the 21st April, 1904, respectively (Paper C).

The Award of the Tribunal was pronounced on the 22nd May, 1905, and was favourable to the contentions of the three Powers (Paper D).

On the 1st September, 1905, His Majesty's Minister at Tôkiô reported that the Japanese Government were proposing to levy income tax on foreign Settlement property at Yokohama, and from subsequent communications it became clear that they were also proposing to impose in full the business tax on the land-renters.

As these proposals indicated that the Japanese Government placed a different interpretation upon the Award from that placed upon it by the three Powers, the Secretary of State felt that it was desirable to have a clear and definite statement of the taxes and charges from which the land-renters could, in view of the Award, claim exemption. For this purpose it was decided that the Agents of the three Powers should again meet in Paris and draft an identic note for presentation to the Japanese Government by their Representatives at Tôkiô, setting forth the deductions drawn by the three Powers from the Award, and specifying the taxes and charges from which they consider the land-renters should be exempt. This draft has now been prepared in the form of a Memorandum, of which a copy is inclosed, together with a translation for convenience of reference (Papers E and F).

You will observe that the claims advanced in this Memorandum comprise six heads, which in the main follow the "Conséquences" which the "Mémoire" (Paper N)* sets out as being the result which the three Powers considered would follow if an Award were pronounced in their favour. The question of the transfer to Japanese subjects of a property held under perpetual lease, which is referred to in the Memorandum, is, however, not comprised in these "Conséquences," and Sir E. Grey is not prepared to concur in the inclusion of this claim in the Memorandum. No such point was raised in the correspondence between His Majesty's Minister and the Japanese Foreign Office, which preceded the agreement to refer the dispute to arbitration in 1902, and the question is not in any way connected either with the Arbitration or the Award.

The paragraphs numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of the Memorandum are in conformity with the claims made in the "Conséquences" set out on pp. 51 and 52 of the "Mémoire," and the Secretary of State sees no objection to the inclusion of these in the Memorandum.

The passage in the Memorandum, beginning with the third paragraph on p. 5, "as already explained" et seq., raises a question of great difficulty, and it is as to this point in particular that Sir E. Grey desires to be furnished with your advice. The claim is in effect one for the complete exemption of the land-renters from all rates and taxes imposed for local purposes, and as such a claim might prove extremely burdensome to the Japanese authorities Sir E. Grey does not consider that it would be expedient, for political reasons, to advance it unless a good case can be made out in its favour.

Taxation for municipal purposes is not in Japan, as in this country, raised solely by means of rates imposed on property, but is very largely derived from proportional additions to the Imperial taxes levied in the district. For instance, the business tax is imposed for Imperial purposes, but in some districts an additional amount equivalent to half the business tax is raised for municipal purposes, and consequently a substantial portion of the taxation imposed for municipal purposes is not taxation directly imposed upon the property held under perpetual leases. The Japanese law governing this matter is the Law of 1888 for the organization of cities, towns and villages, copy of which is inclosed, and the explanation of the system will be found on pp. 82 to 89 of Paper G.

Where the Imperial tax on which the municipal rate is levied is charged on the property (e.g., the land tax and the house tax), the Japanese Government do not contest the right of the land-renters to exemption; but the land-renters claim, in addition, exemption from a municipal rate on any Imperial tax, and it is this claim which is embodied in that Memorandum.

The importance to the land-renters of the claim for exemption from taxation for municipal purposes lies in the fact that unless some such exemption can be secured, it might be possible for the Japanese authorities to shift the basis of the local taxes, and by ceasing to impose taxes such as the "Raokuzai," which is imposed on the property, and by raising all the money required for municipal purposes by means of proportional rates on such Imperial taxes as are not charged on the property, to reduce to a minimum the value of the privilege, which the land-renters enjoy under the Award, of freedom from taxes imposed on the property.

The Secretary of State has not the materials on which to decide whether or not there is any real danger of this being attempted by the Japanese authorities. The exemption, however, is one to which great importance is attached by the land-renters.

It may probably be of some assistance to you in considering these points if the various stages through which this claim has passed are described.

No allusion appears to have been made to it in the correspondence that passed at Tôkiô between the Japanese Foreign Office and the various Legations prior to the Agreement of the 28th August, 1902, for arbitration at The Hague.

In the draft of a joint case, prepared in Japan (Paper G), the claim is limited to one for exemption for the owners of Settlement property from rates on national taxes for municipal purposes. This case, however, when sent home for consideration was not accepted, and the preparation of a fresh draft was commenced.

A Memorandum, prepared in this Department at the time, copy of which is inclosed (Paper I), deals with the question of exemption from municipal taxes in Part II, and this Memorandum, together with other papers, formed the subject of the above-mentioned reference to your predecessors of the 11th August, 1903.

Municipal taxation is dealt with in the "Mémoire" of the three Powers on pp. 31-34, and in "Conséquence" 6, p. 52, and in the "Contre-Mémoire" on p. 43, and the Japanese view in opposition to the above will be found in pp. 63 et seq. of the Japanese Counter-Case (Paper J).

The decision pronounced by the Tribunal at The Hague (Paper D) merely decided the specific point submitted to arbitration, but some of the recitals forming part of the judgment have a material bearing on the question, and in particular § 8 on p. 8 ("Whereas it would be easy to account for the care taken," &c.), and the paragraphs on p. 9, dealing with the status quo.

The Memorandum now prepared in Paris (Paper E) claims entire exemption for the land-renters from any taxation whatever for municipal purposes. The reasoning by which this contention is arrived at is that under the old Regulations, forming part of the contract, embodied in the leases, the necessary municipal services were to be performed by the Japanese Government in return for the ground-rent received. As the Japanese Government continued to perform all these services up till 1899 without any attempt to tax the land-renters for the purpose, the intention of the Treaty, the admitted object of which was to maintain the status quo, must have been to preserve this exemption.

If this reasoning be sound, the result must bear very hardly on the Japanese authorities.

Since the date when the early land Regulations and arrangements for the Treaty ports were made, the municipal life of the towns has enormously developed, and many municipal institutions are now maintained, and municipal services rendered which were then unheard of.

Sir E. Grey is also advised that the soundness of the arguments on which this claim is based is open to doubt.

An examination of the old "Arrangements" relative to each of the Treaty ports will show that in several cases the land-renters were intended either to tax themselves or to make specific payments for certain specially enumerated services. Gradually, however, this practice came to an end, and at almost every port municipal services were entirely paid for by the Japanese Government, and the renters contributed nothing beyond the ground-rent. It is believed that the cause of this state of affairs was that the land-renters were found to have no power to tax themselves and to enforce payment of such taxes; and, in consequence, the Japanese authorities had no alternative but to undertake all the services themselves, whether specifically imposed upon them or not under the early Conventions and Regulations.

The non-taxation of the land-renters for municipal purposes, other than those specifically imposed upon the Japanese Government, would therefore seem, at any rate in part, to be due to their extraterritorial position in Japan, and to be of little value as evidence that the Japanese Government interpreted the contracts with the land-renters as exempting the latter from all taxes for municipal purposes, and that they intended to perpetuate this exemption in the Treaty.

As an alternative to the contention advanced in the Paris Memorandum on this question of municipal taxation, Mr. Hurst, Assistant Legal Adviser to this Department, has suggested that the claim should be limited to one for exemption at each foreign Settlement from taxation for such services as, under the old arrangements relative to the Settlement, can be shown to have been specifically imposed upon the Japanese Government, leaving the Japanese authorities free to levy charges (other than charges imposed—directly or indirectly—upon Settlement property) for all other municipal purposes, such as the up-keep of hospitals or lunatic asylums, or other local services which have come into existence in recent times. The arguments in support of this alternative scheme, together with the objections which can be urged against it, will be found in a Memorandum (Paper K) inclosed.

It would seem to follow from the grounds on which this proposal is based that, where land-renters were liable to be taxed by municipal bodies of their own appointment, or by the Consular authorities, for particular purposes, such as lighting or cleaning the streets, the Japanese authorities may impose taxes for the purpose now.

If you consider that the arguments in support of Mr. Hurst's proposal are valid, Sir E. Grey would be willing to suggest to the French and German Governments as an alternative to that put forward in the Memorandum (Paper E).

I am to request that you will take the Memorandum prepared in Paris and the accompanying papers into your consideration and favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion—

1. Whether, under the Treaty of 1894 and the corresponding French and German Treaties, the land-renters are entitled to exemption from all taxes and rates on taxes levied for municipal purposes, whether such taxes are imposed upon the Settlement property or not.

2. In the event of your answering question 1 in the negative, whether the land-renters, in addition to freedom from taxes or charges imposed on a Settlement property, are entitled to exemption in each Settlement from taxation in respect of municipal services specifically assigned to the Japanese Government in the arrangements relative to that Settlement.

3. In the event of your answering question 2 in the affirmative, whether, in cases where the old foreign Settlement was smaller in area than the modern Japanese district in which it has been incorporated, the land-renters are liable to taxation in respect of such services outside the area of the old Settlement, but inside the limits of the modern district.

4. Whether the remaining portions of the Memorandum, not touched by the above questions, may properly be concurred in by His Majesty's Government.

Sir E. Grey will also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general character that you may have to offer.

1 and 2. We think the land-renters are not entitled to exemption from all taxes and rates on taxes levied for municipal purposes. They are entitled (1) to exemption from taxes or rates on the landed property in respect of which they pay the rent fixed in accordance with the arrangements and leases, and (2) to exemption from personal taxation for such municipal purposes as were specifically assigned to the Japanese Government in the arrangements relative to the various foreign Settlements, but they are subject to personal taxation in respect of other municipal services.

3. In spite of the argument which may be founded on the provision in the Treaty of 1894 by which the common fund and property of the Settlement are to be transferred to the Japanese authorities, we think, on the whole, that the true construction of the Treaty is that the Settlements are incorporated in the modern Japanese district for all purposes, and that the land-renters are liable to taxation for the municipal purposes of the extended district, subject only to the exemptions above mentioned.

4. We see no objection to the remaining portion of the Memorandum not touched by the questions referred to us and not dealing with the question of the transfer of property held under perpetual lease to Japanese subjects.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, September 29, 1906.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit for your consideration the papers noted in the accompanying list, which relate to the seizure by the Japanese of the steam-ships "Hsiping" and "Pehping," the property of the Chinese Engineering and Mining Company, in July 1904, while on a voyage from Shanghai with general cargoes for Newchwang and other ports, and to the condemnation by the Japanese Prize Courts of certain portions of their cargoes, notably various shipments of rice, destined for Newchwang.

As you are doubtless aware, during the hostilities between France and China in 1885 the French Government declared their intention of treating rice as a contraband of war, and on that occasion His Majesty's Government addressed a protest to the French Government. (See note to M. Waddington of the 27th February, 1885. France No. 1. 1885, Paper A.)

In this note His Majesty's Government stated that they were unable to admit that, consistently with the law and practice of nations, and with the rights of neutrals, provisions in general could be treated as contraband of war, but that the test appeared to be whether there were circumstances relative to any particular cargo, or its destination, to displace the presumption that articles of this kind were intended for the ordinary use of life, and to show, prima facie at all events, that they were destined for military use. It will be observed that, from the Parliamentary Paper above alluded to, although subsequent notes were exchanged between the two Governments, the question remained unsettled until the termination of hostilities.

Since that date this principle has been consistently maintained by His Majesty's Government, and on the outbreak of the recent hostilities between Japan and Russia they felt it incumbent on them to reiterate their view to the Japanese Government, having regard to the ambiguous wording of paragraph 2 of the Japanese Contraband Regulations. (See correspondence inclosed, Paper B.)

Attached to Sir C. MacDonald's despatch No. 32, Treaty, of the 11th July last (Paper C) will be found a Minute by Mr. Hurst, the Assistant Legal Adviser to this Department, reviewing the cases of the "Hsiping" and "Pehping," and laying stress on the inadequacy of the evidence that the goods in question were destined for belligerent use, to which I am to invite your especial attention, and I am to request that you will take these papers into your consideration and will favour the Secretary of State with your opinion:—

- (1.) As to whether His Majesty's Government would be justified in entering a protest against the decision of the Japanese Prize Courts in these cases; and
- (2.) If so, on what grounds such protest could be most advantageously based.

Report.

In our opinion the decision of the Court is in some respects at variance with the principles of international law, and it may be properly made the subject of protest by His Majesty's Government if it is deemed desirable to do so. The Japanese Regulations relating to contraband recognize the distinction between absolute and conditional contraband, and so far they agree with the views maintained by this country, but the decision of the Court deprives the distinction of any practical effect. The most important part of the judgment is that which confiscates the articles of food consigned to Newchwang, and we think that such confiscation, so far as it relates to food not intended for European consumption, is unjustifiable, because the facts in evidence relied upon by the captors did not show that such provisions were intended for the use of the Russian army, but rather supported the contrary inference. Particularly is this the case with the rice as to which the Court did not even purport to find its destination, but only that it was suitable for consumption by Russian troops. The case of provisions suitable only for consumption by Europeans is capable of distinction, and on the facts before us we cannot say that these goods were improperly condemned.

The condemnation of the silver coins is, in our opinion, open to objection on the same grounds, namely, that its destination to the Russian army was not proved. Other portions of the cargo appear to have been treated as absolute contraband, and in the absence of detailed information it is impossible to say whether rightly or not; but the judgment as regards the iron wheels, iron tubes, old iron, iron ore, and timber referred to in Case No. 30, does not find, as required by the Japanese Regulations, that such articles were intended solely for use in war, but only that they might be employed directly for warlike purposes. Such a finding appears to recognize that they are articles incipit usus, and therefore they should be treated only as conditionally contraband.

The lead is properly treated as absolute contraband. Assuming, however, that the articles of food and other articles incipit usus were properly treated as contraband under the existing conditions, we think they should not have been held liable to confiscation, but only to pre-emption. Those States which recognize the distinction between absolute and conditional contraband do not in practice confiscate, but instead exercise the right of pre-emption, and although this practice may be regarded originally as a Concession, it is now so well established that a just cause of complaint arises against a State which fails to observe it. We notice that some portion of the cargo, though innocent, was condemned on the ground that its owner was also the owner of contraband articles carried on the same ship, and of this innocent cargo some was consigned to Newchwang and some to other neutral ports. The condemnation of such innocent cargo consigned to Newchwang is lawful, assuming that the other cargo was contraband, and perhaps in principle so is the condemnation of such innocent cargo consigned to other neutral ports.

The wording, if not the substance, of the Japanese Regulations relating to conditional contraband is objectionable, and may enable a Prize Court to condemn without the necessity of finding definitely that articles only conditionally contraband are, in fact, intended for the use of enemy forces.

If any protest be made, it should be confined as far as possible to questions of principle, and may include the non-application of the rule as to pre-emption, the

Foreign Office, April 24, 1906.

Gentlemen,

Concessions in Liberia in violation of Treaty Rights.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you various papers in connection with the validity of certain Concessions granted by the Government of the Republic of Liberia and the effect thereon of the Anglo-Liberian Treaty of 1848.

The financial embarrassments of that Republic had recently reached such a point as greatly to facilitate the designs known to be entertained by Germany upon its independence, the maintenance of which has for many years been a matter of great concern to His Majesty's Government.

When, therefore, in 1904 it came to the knowledge of this Office that the Liberian Development Company, of which Sir H. Johnston was Chairman, were endeavouring to negotiate a loan to Liberia of sufficient amount to put both their own finances and those of Liberia on a sound basis, it was thought desirable to give such unofficial encouragement and support as was possible to a scheme which seemed to offer the only means of averting the danger of German aggression, the Liberian Government being largely indebted to German firms.

Messrs. Emile Erlanger and Sons agreed to advance to the Liberian Government, through the Chartered Company, the sum of 100,000*l.*, the greater portion of which was to be spent on developing the resources of the country, road-making, &c., whilst some 30,000*l.* was to be used to pay off the existing debts of the Government to the German firms. Messrs. Erlanger, however, only agreed to advance the money on the understanding that the customs and financial system of the Republic were to be reformed, and accordingly made it a condition that His Majesty's Government would recommend to the Liberian Government two British officials for appointment as Customs Inspectors and Financial Advisers. This was agreed to, and the scheme was sanctioned by the Liberian Government early this year. Details of the scheme as finally passed will be found in Paper A.

It is to be noted that although His Majesty's Government have accepted no official responsibility in the matter beyond recommending the two officials above referred to, they are to a certain extent morally pledged to the support of the scheme.

The history of the Chartered Company is, briefly, as follows:—

A Charter was granted in January 1901 to the Union Mining Company of Liberia, and transferred soon after, with the sanction of the Liberian Government, to the West Africa Gold Concession (Limited).

This Charter (Paper B), which concerns the two counties of Montserrado, in the extreme west, and Maryland, in the extreme east of the country, conferred on the grantees sole and exclusive mining rights and also certain non-exclusive rights, such as those to open banks and build railways.

On the 16th April, 1903, Sir H. Johnston wrote to ask for information about the Company, having been invited to join the board. He was informed, in reply, that His Majesty's Government could not guarantee either the authenticity of the Charter or its validity according to Liberian law, and that the question of His Majesty's Government recognizing the Charter had never arisen; that there had been no reason to raise objections, and, of course, there had been no pledge to support any of the clauses, and that, so far as His Majesty's Government were aware, their support had not been required, and their position had merely been that they hoped the enterprise might be successful.

The West Africa Gold Concession, with the consent of the Liberian Government, assumed, in December 1904, the style of the Liberian Development Company (Chartered and Limited).

This change of name was due to arrangements which were come to with another enterprise. The researches after minerals had not proved encouraging, and so the Company bought up the Liberian Rubber Syndicate, which held a Concession (Paper C) giving it the sole right to gather and prepare rubber on the public lands of Liberia and the exclusive right to export rubber from the Republic, subject to the payment of a royalty to the Liberian Government. These royalties have since been pledged to the service of the Liberian Government Loan of 1871 and to the amortization of the bonds deposited with the Council of Foreign Bondholders. This Syndicate was now reorganized as the "Monrovia Rubber Company," distinct for purposes of finance from, but otherwise closely affiliated to the Chartered Company, the offices and Secretary in London being common to the two Companies, as also to a great extent the employés and premises in Liberia.

In March 1904 the Liberian Government issued a notice (Paper D) explaining the scope of the Rubber Concession, and upholding their right to grant it.

Article II of the Anglo-Liberian Treaty of 1848 (Paper E) provides for reciprocal freedom of commerce between the two countries. It also stipulates that British subjects shall be allowed to buy from, and to sell to, whom they like, without being restrained or prejudiced by any monopoly, contract, or exclusive privilege of sale or purchase whatever. It also provides for most-favoured-nation treatment.

Article IV provides that all articles the produce of the Republic may be exported therefrom by British subjects and British vessels on as favourable terms as by the subjects and vessels of any other foreign country.

The principal European nations have Treaties with Liberia, drawn up in almost identical terms.

The question thus arises whether the two Concessions already referred to, the one belonging to a Company who, as explained above, are receiving a certain amount of support from His Majesty's Government, and the other, to a second Company in such close relationship with the first as to be practically identical with it, are inconsistent with the terms of these Treaties.

With regard to the Mining Concession, it may perhaps be argued that it does not amount to a monopoly, since exclusive rights are only granted over a portion of the territory of the Republic, and that, therefore, it is still open to other persons to obtain similar rights in the remaining portions of the country.

With regard to the Rubber Concession I am to explain that, with a view to meeting objections which might be made to the undertaking on the ground of its monopolistic character, the Company have established a system of licences under which all who so desire may work and export rubber on payment of a royalty to the Company. It is pointed out that this is a perfectly fair arrangement, as the Company are put to great expense in the work of opening up the country, replanting the rubber trees, conciliating native chiefs, &c., in the benefits of which those working rubber under the licences share equally with the concessionnaires, and to which it is reasonable that they should make some contribution.

Provision for this arrangement was made in an Agreement between the Company and the Liberian Government for the extension of the Concession for a further period (Paper F), which also stipulates that the Company shall not raise the amount of the royalty without the consent of the Liberian Government.

In deciding whether in granting these Concessions Liberia has infringed her Treaties with foreign Powers, it is of importance to take into consideration the attitude adopted by His Majesty's Government with regard to the establishment of the Concession system in the Congo Free State and French Congo, i.e., that the grant of Concessions conferring exclusive rights over the natural produce of the soil is a violation of Articles I and V of the Berlin Act, the former of which provides that the trade of all nations shall enjoy complete freedom in the Congo basin, and the latter that no Power which exercises sovereign rights in that basin shall be allowed to grant therein a monopoly or favour of any kind in matters of trade. See the annexed despatch to His Majesty's Representatives abroad in regard to the affairs of the Congo Free State (Paper G).

A copy of the Berlin Act is also annexed (Paper H).

The question of the claims of certain British firms against the French Government for the loss of their trade in French Congo, owing to the establishment of concessionary Companies, formed the subject of references, dated the 19th February and the 13th March, 1903, from this Department to the then Law Officers of the Crown.

Copies of these references, together with the reports received in reply, are annexed (Papers I and J).

It will be seen that in the latter of the two reports the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General disagreed. Since that date, however, His Majesty's Government have not ceased to press upon the French Government the view that the Concessions granted by them constitute an infraction of the Berlin Act, for which compensation is due to the British firms. The arguments used by the French Government have been similar in character to those adopted by the Liberian Government.

They draw a distinction between exclusive rights in property and exclusive rights in trade, maintaining that such of the vast stretches of territory as were ownerless at the time the French Congo passed under French sovereignty are now, together with their products, French property, and that they are free to grant them to concessionary Companies.

I have the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to request you to take the above mentioned papers into your consideration, and to favour him with your opinion as to whether His Majesty's Government can, consistently with the attitude taken up by them with respect to the grant of exclusive Concessions in the Congo Free State and French Congo, maintain that the above-mentioned mining rights, as granted to the Liberian Development Company, or the Rubber Concession granted to the Monrovia Rubber Company, do not constitute an infringement of (1) the rights of other British subjects under the Anglo-Liberian Treaty of 1848, and (2) the rights of the subjects of other foreign Powers having similar Treaties or the right to most-favoured-nation treatment.

Sir E. Grey would also be glad if you would furnish him with such general observations as may occur to you on these papers.

Report.

In our opinion, there is very little difference in point of principle between the Concessions resisted by the British Government in the case of the Congo and those which are now under review in the case of Liberia. No copy of the Congolese Concession is before us, but we may gather its purport from the references to it in the cases laid before the ex-Law Officers and their opinion thereon. From these documents it appears that the French Government, by Presidential Decree of the 28th March, 1899, declared that all vacant and ownerless land in the Congo belonged to the State domain. Having thus assumed a right of property in these unoccupied lands, the French Government proceeded to grant to its concessionnaires the "jouissance et exploitation" of the rubber in the districts named. The interest thus conferred indicates a restricted right of property or possession, rather than one merely of trade-mark. It is by virtue of the same right of property that the Liberian Government has granted the Concession now before us. It clearly claims the land over which the Concession is to operate as State domain, and purports to confer an interest founded upon the proprietary rights. We think that His Majesty's Government may lay themselves open to a charge of inconsistency in reprobating such Concessions on the Congo while approbating them in Liberia. Generally, the legality of these Concessions depends on whether they are grants of property or grants of a trade monopoly.

The real difficulty, however, in the case turns on the question as to whether the subject-matter of the Concession, namely, minerals or india rubber, our vast tracts of unoccupied land can be called property in a real and substantial sense. So far as minerals are concerned, it is quite in accordance with the idea of civilized States that they should be regarded as absolute property of the State, and, therefore, capable of being given in whole or in part to any person on any terms the State may think fit, without infringing the provisions of the Treaty against purely trade monopolies. It is not so easy to bring the case of rubber under this principle, although it is difficult to draw any legal distinction between the vegetable and the mineral products of lands which are the property of the State. The areas from which the rubber is collected are apparently not capable of being reduced into possession in the same way as ordinary forms of property, and the rubber is probably collected by the natives as a natural product belonging to no one. Moreover, it seems to constitute practically the only article which the natives have to barter, and therefore an exclusive grant of rubber approaches in effect, at all events, to an exclusive right to trade. At the same time, if the Liberian Government is competent to make contracts and Treaties in the same form as other Governments, it must be regarded as having the right, inherent in any civilized Government, of dealing with ownerless or unoccupied lands within its boundaries so as to constitute them a State domain. Undoubtedly the substantial effect is to leave the general right of trade in operation, but greatly limited by rights of property. On the other hand, the grants of such exclusive rights of property are perhaps necessary in order to ensure development of the country, and there seems no clear principle on which it is possible to prohibit them and yet to reserve to each Government its full right to part with the property it is entitled to claim on its unoccupied lands.

The words of Article II of the Treaty of November 1848, giving to foreigners the right to buy and sell without restraint from any monopoly or exclusive privilege of sale or purchase, are undoubtedly very strong, but they do not express any restriction on the rights of the State over public lands, and the words of the Charter or Concession confer only the right of collecting and preparing india-rubber on public lands alone. The Treaty, therefore, may be said to prevent monopolies in trade, while the Charter confers only rights of property. On this view the Charter is valid, except as to the clauses stipulating for an exclusive right of export. This clause is clearly inconsistent with the rights of foreign nations entitled under the most-favoured-nation clause to the benefits of Article IV of the Treaty. It is also an infringement of the rights of British subjects other than the concessionnaires.

Burns,
Philp, and
Co. against German authorities in the Marshall and Caroline Islands.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, November 14, 1905.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list relative to the claim of an Australian firm, Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co. (Limited), against the German Government for losses that they consider they have suffered through the action of the German authorities in the Marshall Islands and the Caroline Islands.

The case was originally brought to the notice of this Department in a letter from the Colonial Office, dated the 12th October, 1904, inclosing correspondence in which it was stated that the German authorities in the Marshall group were imposing a trading license fee upon British steamers at the rate of 225*l.* (4,500 marks) the first month—this being a minimum charge—and afterwards at the rate of 7*l.* 10*s.* (150 marks) a-day. It was further stated that in the German islands oil motor-vessels were compelled to pay the same rates as steamers, sailing-vessels paying half the above rates; that port dues were additional, and that only Germans were allowed to lease land for trading stations, whereas in the British Solomons, Gilbert and Ellice Islands, Germans are permitted to trade on precisely the same footing as British subjects.

Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co. complained that they had been the victims of the imposition of these exorbitant dues, and that they were thus placed on a footing of trading inequality with the "Jaluit Gesellschaft," the German Company established at Jaluit, the capital of the Marshall Islands.

These allegations were at once brought to the notice of the German Government by His Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin, who was instructed on the 19th October in a despatch (Paper (A)) to call attention to the provisions of Articles 2 and 3 of the Declarations between Great Britain and Germany relative to their respective spheres of influence in the Western Pacific, signed at Berlin in April 1886, and to ask for an explanation of the absence of reciprocity which appeared to prevail.

Copies of these Declarations are appended (Papers (B) and (C)). Article 2 prescribes that—

"The subjects of either State shall be free to resort to all the possessions or Protectorates of the other State in the Western Pacific and to settle there, and to acquire and to hold all kinds of property, and to engage in all descriptions of trade and professions and agricultural and industrial undertakings, subject to the same conditions and laws, and enjoying the same protection and privileges as the subjects of the sovereign or protecting State."

Article 3 provides that—

"In the British and German possessions and Protectorates in the Western Pacific, the ships of both States shall in all respects reciprocally enjoy equal treatment as well as most-favoured-nation treatment; and merchandize of whatever origin imported by the subjects of either State, under whatever flag, shall not be liable to any other or higher duties than that imported by the subjects of the other State or of any third Power."

It was pointed out that in view of the above stipulations there did not seem, on the face of it, to be any adequate reason why British vessels should be compelled to pay far higher licence fees than were, or would be, paid by foreign vessels in the British groups of islands.

On the 9th December further information was received in a letter from the Colonial Office (Paper (D)) respecting the situation. It appeared that the "Jaluit Gesellschaft" was actually administering the Government of the Marshall Islands, and that in their official capacity they had refused a supply of fresh water to the "Ysabel," a steamer belonging to Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co., although there was said to be a good stock of water available. The Company had dispatched this vessel upon a second trading voyage to the Marshall's in August 1904, in spite of the exorbitant fees for a trading licence imposed on the occasion of her first visit six months earlier, and paid these fees which were again demanded, viz., a minimum charge of 225*l.* for one month's licence, and thereafter a charge of 7*l.* 10*s.* per day. The "Ysabel" was obliged to return to Tarawa, in the Gilbert group, a distance of nearly 400 miles, to obtain a supply of water before continuing her voyage, and the projected extension of her voyage to the Carolines had to be abandoned.

The German Government offered an explanation to Sir F. Lascelles' representations in the shape of an Aide-mémoire (Paper (E)), communicated on the 7th December.

It was observed from this document that since the complaint made by Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co., the charges in question had been doubled, and an export duty of 30 marks (1*l.* 10*s.*) imposed upon copra.

The German Government contended that all these Decrees held good for every one without respect of nationality, and did not therefore constitute an infringement of the Agreement concluded between Germany and Great Britain on the 10th April, 1886. They pointed out in this connection that Article 3 of this Agreement could not, in their opinion, be read to mean, as was alleged in Sir F. Lascelles' note of the 22nd October, that British ships must pay no higher dues in German possessions than German ships did in British possessions. In Article 3 of the Agreement the two Governments simply promised "to accord in their respective possessions a like treatment to each other's ships as to their own ships and to those of the most favoured nation."

A Contract had existed since the year 1888 between the German Government and the Jaluit Company, whereby the latter bore the costs of the administration of the Protectorate of the Marshall Islands and drew the receipts of the public taxes. This Contract, too, the contents of which were officially published at the time, was, it was maintained, not inconsistent with the Agreement of the 10th April, 1886, and during the seventeen years of its existence had never been objected to by His Majesty's Government.

If the taxes on ships in the Protectorate which did not belong to a resident firm had lately been raised and an export duty imposed on copra, these measures had no other object than to raise the revenues of the Protectorate so as to correspond with the growth in latter years of the expenses of the administration borne by the Jaluit Company.

It was pointed out that, by a Decree in force in the Marshall Islands since the year 1888, it was forbidden to conclude contracts with natives on the subject of the purchase of property or real rights in land, or the use of the latter. This Decree, too, applied without distinction to the subjects of all nations. As, therefore, the conclusion of a lease between a native Chief and the Jaluit Company was not legally admissible, the Imperial "Landeshauptmann" at Jaluit had been instructed to revoke the permission he had granted in that instance.

The German Government stated, however, that they were extremely anxious, in view of the very small practical interests of either side in the matter—the total trade of the Marshall Islands in 1903 did not quite amount to 1,000 000 marks (50,000 £)—to avoid a possible difference of opinion as to the meaning of the Agreement of the 10th April, 1886, leading to a dispute out of all proportion to the interests involved. They were, therefore, willing to consider the views of His Majesty's Government if they differed from their own, and would await a further communication on the subject.

The reply of His Majesty's Government to the German contentions was communicated to the German Government on the 27th January, 1905 (Paper (F)).

It was to the effect that, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, the action recently taken in the Marshall Islands and the position which the Jaluit Company have been permitted to assume there, were contrary to the whole spirit of the Declaration of the 10th April, 1886. The intention of that Declaration was, they maintained, that British and German traders should have absolutely equal rights in both German and British possessions in the Western Pacific, and that, in pursuance of this intention, such places as the Marshall Islands should be a neutral region open to the trade of both nations on a basis of free competition. This view was confirmed by the correspondence preceding the signature of the Declaration, and by the recommendations of the Anglo-German Commission appointed to define the interests of Great Britain and Germany in the Western Pacific. The third of these recommendations was "that the two Governments agree not to grant any monopoly of any kind in matters of trade." This, it was true, did not specifically apply to the Marshall Islands, and in the subsequent negotiations it was dropped as unnecessary, but it showed what the Commissioners intended in regard to trade, and consequently what the two Governments agreed to embody in the Declaration of 1886, which had its origin in the recommendations of the Commission.

With regard to the state of affairs existing in the Marshall Islands, His Majesty's Government desired to point out that if, as was possible, there were no German firms trading in and with the islands except the Resident Jaluit Company, it followed that the increase of dues on steamers belonging to non-resident firms, though in form applicable to all without respect of nationality, was in practice a measure of discrimination against British and foreign vessels, and therefore, so far as the former were concerned, contrary to the Declaration.

Moreover, as the administration of the islands was entirely in the hands of that Company, a special disadvantage was imposed on British traders, owing to the fact that the taxes levied went to swell the revenues of the Company. A system was thus created quite incompatible with the principles of free competition which the Declaration was intended to promote, for even if British traders could establish themselves as residents in the islands, they would still be unable to carry on their trade on equal terms with a firm which had in its hands the whole machinery of administration, and was therefore enabled to use its powers of imposing taxation for the purpose of excluding all competition.

Attention was called at the same time to the want of hospitality shown by the Jaluit Company in refusing the supply of water to the "Ysabel."

In the meantime (on the 10th October), the "Ysabel" had set out (Paper (G)) on her third trading voyage to the Marshall Islands. Upon her arrival at Jaluit on the 19th she was informed by the German authorities that the licence fees for foreign vessels had been doubled since her last visit, and were now at the minimum rate of 450 £. per month, and thereafter at the rate of 15 £. per day. This was referred to in the German Aide-mémoire.

In such circumstances the "Ysabel" had no alternative but to abandon her projected trading cruise, and left the group without landing her inward cargo, consisting of trade goods specially ordered for Australia, some of it for British subjects, to the value of about 1,100 £.

On the 7th March the Colonial Office supplied further information furnished by Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co., showing that trade in the Caroline group was excluded by an absolute prohibition and monopoly, except in the case of two small islands, the trade of which is of no practical value. Attention was also drawn to the refusal by the German authorities of permission to acquire land in the Marshall Islands and so secure domicile for trading purposes, already referred to in the Aide-mémoire communicated by the German Government on the 7th December, 1904. It appeared that a firm could only become domiciled in the Marshall Islands by buying or leasing land or buildings from non-natives or from the authorities, and this was refused.

Moreover, the evil results of the dual position of the Jaluit Company as administrative officials and traders now became more apparent. For though nominal equality of treatment was granted to all traders, yet in reality the Jaluit Company need only make a book entry—"a debit of taxation and a credit of revenue"—while the ship of any other trading Company must produce cash. Thus, in practice, the British ship paid and the German ship did not.

It may be mentioned here, parenthetically, that a proposal was made by the Jaluit Company to come to a compromise with Messrs. Burns, Philp, whereby the new licence fees in the Marshall Islands should be allowed to remain, so as to keep out the British firm, while in return the Jaluit Company should undertake to give up trading with the British Gilbert and Ellice Islands, with which they had a not inconsiderable trade. His Majesty's Government refused, of course, to be a party to an arrangement on such a basis, since it would be unfair to other British traders who might hereafter wish to trade with the Marshall Islands, nor could they encourage or directly sanction an arrangement which would establish a monopoly in direct contradiction to the Declaration of 1886.

An inquiry, on the part of Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co., as to the charter and status of the Jaluit Company, the amounts of fees and duties leviable in the German Pacific Islands, and the amount of Government expenditure (besides subsidies) authorized in those possessions, having been referred to the German Government, a collection of notes throwing light on these points was furnished to His Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin, and will be found in his despatch No. 106 of the 17th April, (Paper (H)), to which attention is invited.

Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co. at the same time put in a claim for 10,000 £. (Paper (I)) for losses caused by the German authorities in regard to the "Ysabel."

In putting forward their statement of claim they distinctly state that, in order that there might be no doubt as to the treatment their vessels would receive in the Caroline and Marshall groups, and before anything was done, inquiry on the subject was made at the office of the German Consulate in Sydney, and the reply of the Consul-General was to the effect that the vessels would be treated as German vessels were treated.

The facts of the case are stated as follows:—

The steamer "Ysabel" was dispatched from Sydney on the 11th March, 1904, for the Marshall and Caroline Islands. The request for the requisite licence to trade in the Marshalls was granted, but a previously unheard-of fee was demanded, viz., 4,500 marks (225 £.) for four weeks. This heavy fee was paid, and after transacting all the business possible on a first voyage, the "Ysabel" left for the Carolines.

On her arrival at the Carolines, application was made for a trading licence for that group. The supercargo was at once informed that the "Jaluit Gesellschaft" had a monopoly, except as regards two islands, viz., Ponapi and Kusae, for which a licence at the rate of 75 £. per annum was offered. As the trade of the two islands in question is practically nil, there was nothing to be gained by taking out a licence to trade there, and, as the authorities absolutely refused a licence for the islands where trade was possible, there was nothing for the steamer to do but leave without having accomplished anything.

The "Ysabel" reached the Marshalls on her second voyage at the beginning of August, and it was on this occasion that the authorities refused the permission to the Company to acquire land from a native Chief. The land in question was waste and uninhabited, and a lease of it was duly sought with a view to the erection of buildings, in order to establish a claim to domicile on the part of the firm.

The terms of the proposed Agreement with the Chief were similar to those on which the Jaluit Company had themselves recently acquired land from the same Chief for trading purposes.

On this voyage also the "Ysabel," having fallen short of drinking water, applied for and was refused a supply, as previously related.

In October the "Ysabel" proceeded on her third voyage to the Marshalls. Neither on this nor on the previous voyage did she touch at the Carolines—the prohibition there was complete. This time a further surprise awaited the representatives of the firm on their arrival at the Marshalls. They were informed that the licence fee for four weeks' trading had been raised from 4,500 to 9,000 marks.

Messrs. Burns, Philp assert that the steamer did not carry enough gold to meet, in addition to other requirements, the unexpected demand thus suddenly sprung upon her. The supercargo offered to pay by draft on the owners, but this was refused, and there being no other course open, the "Ysabel" forthwith entered upon her return voyage to Sydney empty. The actual money loss of this trip is stated to have exceeded 1,000*l.*, the distance steamed being over 6,000 miles. The profit anticipated was, of course, entirely lost.

The firm drew attention to the fact that steamers of any nationality can trade in any one of the three adjoining groups—the Solomons, the Gilbert, and the Ellice, all British—for a fee of 100*l.*, covering the whole year, whilst in the Marshalls, the fee per voyage paid on two occasions equalled 2,925*l.* a-year, and this was raised on the last occasion to the equivalent of 5,850*l.* a-year, it being assumed that thirteen voyages might be made in a year. German vessels trade regularly at the British groups, paying only the 100*l.* a-year.

In hope of some change in the official attitude, and with a desire to keep faith with the native Chiefs, Messrs. Burns, Philp decided to again dispatch the "Ysabel" to the Marshalls, and with gold enough to pay the heavy fee now demanded. On the 16th November she was advertised to sail on the 19th. She was coaled, provisioned, her crew secured, cargo taken on board, and two passengers booked. On the 18th, when all arrangements for the sailing on the 19th were nearing completion, an intimation was received from the German Consulate in Sydney, in response to direct inquiry as to taxation, that, in addition to the licence fee of 9,000 marks for the voyage, an export tax of 30 marks per ton on all copra exported had been imposed. The fact that a fee of 450*l.* was to be supplemented by an export tax of 450*l.* (reckoning 300 tons copra), making together an aggregate taxation of 900*l.*, compelled the firm to review the position. The result was that the trip was cancelled; the crew were discharged, cargo and provisions relanded. This again represented considerable expenditure, which was absolutely lost.

In consideration of this series of restrictions placed on their trade, and the losses sustained on the several occasions recorded, the Company, as previously stated, put in a claim for 10,000*l.*

The Colonial Office, in forwarding the claim, stated that Mr. Secretary Lyttelton was of opinion that the British firm had an equitable claim on the German Government, for, while it was possible that the letter, though not the spirit, of the Declaration of the 10th April, 1886, might be held to justify the imposition of the licence fees (on the ground that they were applicable to all ships belonging to firms not domiciled in the Marshall Islands), and also the refusal of permission to Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co. to lease land, yet, on the ground stated in paragraph 11 of Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co.'s claims, viz., that the Jaluit Company appeared to unite the functions of a Government and the operations of a trading body, and that there was no reason to suppose that its own operations were affected in any way by abnormal fees or would be affected by an export tax on copra, the imposition of such a tax was clearly contrary to the Declaration, which guarantees equal treatment to British and German subjects in all descriptions of trade and to British and German ships in all respects.

As Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co. pointed out, their payment of the export tax on copra was a bond fide payment, whereas that of the Jaluit Company was not. It was possible that the latter might urge, in reply, that they had to defray the expenses of the administration of the islands, from which their rivals were free; but that argument did not appear altogether relevant. If Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co. were made, contrary to the Declaration, to pay heavier taxes than the Jaluit Company, it seemed no answer to say that the latter had heavier expenses to meet.

Before, however, such a claim could be presented, it was necessary that a more detailed statement of the damage sustained, together with any available supporting documents, must be obtained.

In this view Lord Lansdowne concurred.

The abstract of the claim and particulars of damage were subsequently communicated on the 19th October, and will be referred to later.

The official reply of the German Government to the British representations of the 27th January was received on the 13th March, and was as follows (Paper (J)):

"The Imperial Government think they may assume from the Ambassador's note of the 27th January of this year that His Britannic Majesty's Government do not deny that the letter of the Declaration of the 10th April, 1886, is not in itself opposed to the view of the Imperial German Government.

"If His Britannic Majesty's Government hold a different opinion concerning the spirit of the Treaty, the Imperial Government must, on their side, draw attention to the fact that the third recommendation in the preliminary draft of the two members of the Anglo-German Commission, . . . which provided for the prohibition of monopolies, was not included in the final text of the Declaration."

An explanation was also given of the refusal to supply the "Ysabel" with water in the following terms:—

"It must, in the first place, be stated that there are no public reservoirs of water in the Marshall Islands. The cisterns erected by the Jaluit Company at their own cost are intended for the use of the factory, the Imperial Administration, the Imperial men-of-war, and the mail-steamer. As a rule, the supply is large enough to provide drinking water for the natives, and for the ships which put into the harbour.

"The Jaluit Company are on that account convinced that the 'Ysabel' would not have been refused a supply of drinking water. According to information in the possession of the Jaluit Company, it was a question of supplying large quantities of fresh water for feeding the boilers, which could not be granted, in view of the Company's own requirements, of the fact that a long visit by the Imperial war-ship 'Condor' was in prospect, and that the arrival of the mail-steamer was expected in a few days. Moreover, the 'Ysabel' was not prevented from undertaking her projected voyage to the Carolines. Her stock of water was sufficient for the voyage from Jaluit to Tarawa, and consequently the trip to the Island of Kusaie, in the Caroline group, could have been continued, for the latter is exactly the same distance from Jaluit, and contains a supply of fresh running water."

While further representations to the German Government and replies to the arguments advanced by them on several points were under consideration, a note (Paper (K)) was received from Count Bernstorff, the German Chargé d'Affaires, couched in a most conciliatory spirit, and announcing a disposition on the part of the German Government to come to an early settlement respecting the questions in dispute.

It stated that, in the view of the German Government, the Convention of the 10th April, 1886, assured equal treatment to German and British subjects in the possessions of both Powers lying in the Western Pacific Ocean, but left to both Governments a perfectly free hand to impose taxes and duties in their own territories. The Regulations issued by the German Government with regard to shipping tolls and export duty on copra were applied equally to both German and British subjects, and were therefore in complete agreement with the Convention. Besides, there was no contradiction between the Convention and the Agreement concluded with the Jaluit Company in 1888, as the rights of each Government to administer independently their own possessions were not restricted by the Convention of 1886. His Majesty's Government, moreover, seemed to have shared this view hitherto, since otherwise sixteen years would hardly have elapsed without a protest being raised against the Agreement with the Company.

Although the German Government considered that their attitude was perfectly justified from the legal point of view, they did not desire that a matter of such trifling importance should lead to a serious difference of opinion between the two Governments. As His Majesty's Government maintained that the effect of the Agreement of 1888 had been to accord preferential treatment to the Jaluit Company, the German Government were prepared to take account of this cause of complaint. They would terminate the Agreement with the Jaluit Company at the end of the present financial year, i.e., on the 31st March, 1906, and the result would be that on the 1st April the administration of the Marshall Islands, and especially the collection of public revenues, would be transferred to the Imperial authorities.

The German Government would, moreover, proceed immediately to a revision of the Regulations at present in force in the Marshall Islands with regard to the levying of public revenues, and would remodel them on the basis of balancing revenue and expenditure. The measures adopted in this connection would come into force on the 1st October, 1905.

In view of these assurances and the changes contemplated, His Majesty's Government considered that no further representations were called for, either in regard to the increased licence dues or to the export tax on copra, since the difficulties on both points would probably be met by the termination of the Company's Agreement.

But the question of the acquisition of land in the islands with a view of securing domicile for trading purposes, together with the question of the absolute prohibition to trade in the Caroline Islands, had been left untouched in Count Bernstorff's note.

It was therefore decided to call the attention of the German Government to these two points, and to request that prompt inquiry should be made.

Sir F. Lascelles accordingly addressed a note (Paper (L)) to the German Government, in which he requested fuller information respecting the acquisition of land, and at the same time asked for explanations respecting the exclusion of trade in the Caroline group by an absolute prohibition and monopoly, except in the case of the two small islands previously referred to.

It was pointed out that, though the Caroline Islands were acquired by Germany from Spain in 1899, subsequently therefore to the Declaration of 1886, the group lies clearly within the area to which the Declaration applies.

The Regulations in force in the Caroline Islands, as set forth in the notes communicated by the German Government, and already alluded to, did not contain provisions which in themselves involved any such absolute prohibition as that of which complaint is made. It would appear, therefore, that the refusal to issue a licence to trade to British vessels must have been the result of some illegal and locally imposed conditions, and not authorized by the German Government.

Sir F. Lascelles further informed the German Government that Messrs. Burns, Philp had presented a claim for compensation, but that no details were at present available as to the exact amount of the losses sustained by them, nor had any documentary evidence in support of their claim yet been received. Further information on other points was being obtained through the Australian Government.

As the British firm, who had been informed of the German explanations and assurances, were anxious to ascertain whether they would be able to resume trade with the Marshall Islands without unreasonable restrictions after the 1st October, or whether they would be permitted, in anticipation, to acquire lands in both groups with a view to domicile, further inquiries were made by His Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin on these points.

The German Government replied on the 8th July (Paper (M)). With regard to the question of the acquisition of land in the Marshall Islands with a view to securing domicile for trading purposes, they stated that the acquisition of land from natives had been forbidden by Decree since 1888 to all private individuals and firms of whatever nationality, including the Jaluit Company. The action of the Governor in sanctioning the lease of certain land by a native Chief to the Company, to which attention had been called by Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co., was consequently illegal and had since been declared void. For the present the only land that could be bought or leased consisted of those areas which, before the German occupation, belonged to owners other than natives. The German Government, however, intended to extend the conditions under which native lands might be acquired in the Marshall Islands, by permitting the lease of land necessary for the erection of trading stations, so that Messrs. Burns, Philp would find it much easier to establish a domicile. At the same time, instructions would be sent to the Caroline Islands to grant Messrs. Burns, Philp permission to lease land for trading stations.

With regard to the absolute prohibition to trade in the Caroline Islands, the German Government pointed out that the Declaration of the 10th April, 1886, as to mutual freedom of trade, &c., was closely connected with the Declaration of the 6th April, 1886, respecting the delimitation of the German and British spheres of influence in the Pacific. There could, therefore, they maintained, be no doubt that the extent of their application was the same. The Declaration of the 6th April, 1886, did not apply "to any islands or places in the Western Pacific which are now under the sovereignty or protection of any civilized Power other than Germany or Great Britain." Shortly before the signature of both Declarations of 1886 both Germany and England recognized the sovereignty of Spain over the Carolines. Thus, neither the Declaration of the 6th April, 1886, nor that of the 10th April, applied to the Carolines. This being the legal aspect of the case, the German Government did not consider it necessary to discuss the legality of the official treatment of Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co. at Parape. They intended, however, to revise the trade Decrees of the Carolines also, but merely with a view to bringing about a final settlement of trade questions in the whole of the German Protectorates in the Pacific.

Finally, the date on which new Regulations respecting trade would come into force, both in the Marshall and Caroline Islands, was fixed for the 1st October. The German Government were occupied with a revision of the fiscal legislation in the Marshall Islands, in which their guiding principle would be to balance revenue and expenditure. The new Regulations would be communicated to Messrs. Burns, Philp through the German Consul-General at Sydney. The firm must, however, wait for their permission to lease land till October 1905, owing to the time required for postal communications between Germany and her South Sea Protectorates and the infrequency of the service.

The German Government declined to admit that there could be a legal foundation for a claim for compensation on the part of Messrs. Burns, Philp. They stated that their action in the Marshall Islands had in no way infringed the Declaration of the 10th April, 1886, and that, as pointed out above, this Declaration did not apply to the Carolines.

At an interview which took place shortly afterwards between Lord Lansdowne and the German Ambassador on the 29th July, Count Metternich asserted that the new system would in full measure meet the Australian wishes, and that he would shortly furnish a description of the new Regulations.

This information was communicated in a note dated the 4th August (Paper (N)). The Regulations, which would come into force on the 1st October, were stated as follows:—

"Commercial firms established in the Marshall Islands will have to pay from that date a trading tax of 6,000 marks per annum, payable in advance and in quarterly instalments at the beginning of each quarter. This tax, corresponding with the deposit which has been paid by foreign firms without protest since the establishment of the German Protectorate in the Marshall Islands, must be regarded as very light. It will be the only tax levied on commerce, since the former taxation of trading stations and the export duty on copra will have been abolished, and it will not nearly cover the costs of the administration of the Protectorate.

"The opportunity to acquire domicile in the Protectorate will, after that date, be offered to any one who desires to establish a commercial enterprise there. Although, for the purpose of protecting the indigenous population, the sale of native land to foreigners will not be allowed, it will in the future be open to every trader to lease, with official sanction, from the natives such land as he may require for the erection of warehouses. The Imperial Commissioner at Jaluit has been instructed to assist all merchants in the conclusion of such leases. The possibility of difficulties with regard to the establishment of domicile is in this manner excluded.

"In view of the fact that settlement in the Protectorate will be facilitated in this way, there would seem to be no obvious necessity of admitting the trade in ships not belonging to the Protectorate in addition to the commercial undertakings established there. The Imperial Government, however, have refrained from prohibiting this trade, since this might be characterized as a limitation of the freedom of trade. A tax of 2,000 marks per annum, payable in advance, will in future be imposed on ships not engaged in trade on behalf of commercial firms established in the Protectorate."

"Although the Imperial Government maintain their views that the Agreement of the 10th April, 1886, does not extend to the Caroline Islands, they have subjected the Regulations in force there with regard to commerce to revision, in order to effect a definite settlement. An order has been issued to the effect that the whole territory of the East Carolines (seat of Government Ponape) should be thrown open to all traders. The dues to be charged are based on the Ordinance of the 8th August, 1904, which will be enforced in the whole territory of the East Carolines on the 1st October next.

"The Imperial Officer at Ponape has been instructed to issue a trading licence to any individual who desires to trade in the East Carolines, on his paying the prescribed dues, and to avoid any limitation of such licences on the ground of the insufficient production of the islands.

"Further, no obstacle will be placed in the way of the acquisition of domicile there."

Count Oberndorff, of the German Embassy, in delivering the above note, observed that he was also instructed to say that the German Government, without admitting liability, were desirous of settling in one way or another with Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co., and were ready to examine any evidence which the firm could produce in support of their claim.

The Colonial Office, in a letter of the 4th August, stated that it would in all probability have a very good effect on Australian opinion if the German Government could see their way to meeting the wishes of the Commonwealth Government by granting permission to Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co. to enter at once into preliminary negotiations for leasing land for trading stations, in anticipation of the formal enactment of the new Regulations. If the German Government were prepared to accept this suggestion, it would be useful, if the general character of the new Regulations could be indicated, for the guidance of Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co. in their negotiations for the lease of native land.

Sir F. Lascelles, therefore, acting on instructions sent to him on the 26th August, addressed a note (Paper (O)) to the German Government which dealt with the further points raised by Count Metternich's note of the 4th August and the Colonial Office letter of the same date.

The German Government were reminded that at present they owned no landed property themselves in the Marshall Islands, and that they had no information as to the amount of land in the hands of private owners, other than natives, which might be available for acquisition by foreigners. His Majesty's Government assumed, however, that, in view of the present position of this question and of the smallness of the area likely to be thus available, Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co., or other British firms, would have equal opportunities with the Jaluit Company, or other German purchasers, of acquiring such land. It might be desirable, as a measure of precaution, that the Imperial Government should discourage any further transfer of land in the islands, so as to prevent all the land now in the market being bought up in anticipation of the arrangements in contemplation, unless Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co. could be permitted to enter at once into preliminary negotiations for the lease of land from natives.

With reference to the Caroline Islands, His Majesty's Government felt bound to record their dissent from the German contention that, in view of the intimate connection between the Declaration of the 6th April, 1886, respecting the delimitation of the British and German spheres of influence in the Pacific, and that of the 10th April, 1886, as to mutual freedom of trade and intercourse, there could be no doubt that the scope of the application was the same, and that the latter did not apply to the Caroline Islands, this view being based on the ground that the islands, being then "under the sovereignty of a civilized Power other than Great Britain or Germany," are specifically excluded from the operation of the earlier Declaration.

It was pointed out that to sustain this contention it would be necessary to construe the two Agreements as practically constituting a single document, but to this both the wording and the general composition of the Declarations appeared manifestly opposed.

The Declarations appeared to His Majesty's Government to be wholly distinct and self-contained. They referred to different subjects and were aimed at dissimilar objects. The earlier Declaration was made for the purpose of laying down a conventional line of demarcation between the British and German spheres of influence in those regions; and, with a view of avoiding misapprehension or objection on the part of third parties who had interests within the general geographical limits of that Agreement, it was necessary to exclude specifically certain definite areas such as Samoa, Savage Island, and places then "under the sovereignty or protection of any other civilized Power than Great Britain or Germany."

The second Declaration, which is of later date, dealt exclusively with the reciprocal freedom of trade and commerce in the British and German possessions and Protectorates in the "Western Pacific," and defined specifically in Article 1 the meaning and extent of that term for the purposes of the Declaration.

The Agreement was one of a general and permanent nature, applying to future acquisitions as well as to existing Protectorates and possessions, and as the Caroline Islands were within "that part of the Pacific Ocean lying between the 15th parallel of north latitude and the 30th parallel of south latitude, and between the 165th meridian of longitude west and the 130th meridian of longitude east of Greenwich," it seemed clear that they fell within the scope of the Declaration.

No such special limitations were inserted in the Agreement as those contained in Article 6 of the Declaration of the 6th April above referred to; and it was, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, not in accordance with the usually accepted canons of international law to restrict, by inference and implication, the clear meaning of an Agreement by importing into it limitations and reservations contained in a separate and distinct instrument bearing a different date and dealing with a different subject. Had it been thought necessary or desirable to limit the Declaration of the 10th April in the same manner and to the same extent as that of the 6th April, there seemed no reasonable doubt that the clause of limitations would have been inserted. The reason which prompted its insertion in the earlier Declaration was wholly absent in the later, and His Majesty's Government could not accept the view that the omission was accidental and that the restriction should now be presumed and inferred.

It was further pointed out that the Declaration of the 10th April did itself contain in Article 6 a specification of certain Colonies which were excluded from the scope of the Declaration in respect of "possessions and Protectorates in the Western Pacific"; and if other exclusions had been contemplated, specific provision would similarly have been made for them.

In these circumstances, His Majesty's Government were also unable to share the opinion of the German Government, who, acting on the above assumption, held that there could be no legal foundation for a claim for compensation on the part of Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co. in respect of the restraint of their trade in the Caroline Islands.

It was, however, unnecessary to deal with the question in any detail at that moment, as an intimation had been received from Count Metternich that the German Government were prepared to examine any evidence which the firm might be able to produce in support of their claim.

Memoranda were subsequently communicated (on the 30th August) by the German Embassy, containing respectively the text of the new Regulations which are to come into force in the Marshall Islands (Paper (P)), entitled "Ordinance respecting the Prosecution of Commerce in the Marshall Islands," and (Paper (Q)) a "List of Ordinances rendered invalid according to Section 3 of the Ordinance respecting the Prosecution of Commerce in the Marshall Islands from the 1st October, 1905."

The detailed claim of Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co. for compensation was presented by Mr. T. A. Coghlan, Agent-General for the Government of New South Wales (Paper (R)), and transmitted to this Department on the 19th October by the Colonial Office, who requested that, as the claim was causing irritation in Australia, immediate steps should be taken to come to a decision as to the questions of principle involved, and that the claim could then be presented to the German Government immediately upon the arrival from Australia of the documents necessary to enable His Majesty's Government to satisfy themselves, as far as possible, that the amounts claimed were reasonable.

The claim, as originally submitted in January 1905, was for 10,000*l.*; the present claim is for 17,500*l.*, the increase being ascribed to the fact that there has been a continuing loss to the firm during the current year, which loss would continue until full trading rights were again allowed them.

Mr. Coghlan has stated, however, that documentary evidence can be produced only in respect of the sum of 1,377*l.* for "actual out-of-pocket expenditure upon the abortive trip," and the sum of 425*l.* for "expenses in fitting out the vessel and subsequently discharging stores and laying up the ship when the voyage had been abandoned owing to the imposition of prohibitive export duty in addition to exorbitant licence fees."

The balance of the claim is for indirect damage arising out of loss of anticipated profits, the reasonableness of which, it is thought, could only be estimated on a basis of comparison with actual profits made on voyages to the Marshall and Caroline Islands previous to March 1904; but as the Company had not traded with these islands prior to that date, the calculation of such anticipated profits becomes a matter of considerable difficulty.

The Company have supplied an estimate (Paper (S)), to which special attention is called, setting out in detail the reasons by which they seek to justify the amount of this part of their claim, based upon their experience of trading with other of the Pacific Islands and the advice of their own agent who was specially sent to the Marshalls with a view to their opening up trading operations there.

Mr. Light, the Company's solicitor, however, apparently relies, for the establishment in principle of this part of the claim, on the analogy of the "Costa Rica "Packet" case which was laid before the Law Officers on the 3rd April, 1894, and which finally, after submission to arbitration, resulted in an Award in favour of the Company.

Copies of the reports of your predecessors in this case, and of the Award of the Arbitrator, are sent herewith (Papers (T), (U), (V), (W), (X)) for convenience of reference.

In these circumstances Lord Lansdowne requests that you will take the accompanying papers into your consideration, and favour him with your opinion whether a claim on behalf of Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co. can properly be supported by His Majesty's Government, and, if so, on what grounds, and how far the various items specified in the Schedule of the claims presented (Paper (S)) are admissible, if substantiated by evidence.

His Lordship will also be glad to receive any observations of a more general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.

Report.

Although the object of the Declaration signed at Berlin on the 10th April, 1886, is defined in the preamble to be "reciprocal freedom of trade and commerce" in the possessions and Protectorates of the two Governments within the limits therein specified, yet the operative words used in paragraph 2 of the Declaration do not exclude the contention of the German Government that either Government is left with a free hand to impose taxes and duties (however hardly they may tell on general commerce) in its own territory so long as they do not differentiate against the subjects of the other State. We think that it was not intended to limit the rights of either party in respect of internal taxation or administration applicable equally to the subjects of both States.

As regards the Caroline Islands, we think the view put forward by His Majesty's Government is correct. The exclusion of these islands from the Declaration of the 6th April, 1886, when they belonged to Spain was merely by way of reservation of the rights of third parties, but in their subsequent transfer to Germany they were brought within the scope of the Declaration of the 10th April, 1886. That Declaration applies to all future as well as existing possessions and Protectorates within the area then defined (see Article 1), and no such reservation or limitation as appeared in the Declaration of the 6th April, 1886, was necessary or would have been appropriate having regard to the purpose of the later Declaration.

With regard to the Marshall Islands, the German Government has empowered the Jaluit Company to assume a position which is contrary to both the letter and the spirit of the Declaration of the 10th April, 1886. In effect, the German Government has conferred on a particular German subject, or group of subjects, the right to impose differential taxation against British subjects. In form the taxation appears to fall equally on the Jaluit Company, but this is a form only as that Company only pays such taxes into its own coffers.

We think a claim for damages by Messrs. Burns, Philp, and Co. (Limited) may properly be presented to the German Government, subject to the following observations:—

Caroline Islands.

First Voyage.—The actual expenditure incurred in the abortive voyage from the Marshall Islands is recoverable, together with an allowance for the loss of profit over and above such expenditure as they were reasonably entitled to expect.

This claim should be supported by vouchers, which ought to be in existence.

Second and Third Voyages.—The whole loss of profits cannot be claimed. The vessel could have been employed in other, though probably less profitable, trading, and no more than a reasonable allowance based on the usual earnings of a vessel of this class should be claimed. There probably will be difficulty in proving the amounts of anticipated profits alleged, and a much smaller sum than 1,500*l.* should be accepted.

Marshall Islands.

Third Voyage.—The actual expenditure list, which should be capable of being properly vouched, is recoverable, and, in addition, an allowance for loss of trading.

Projected Voyage.—The expenses claimed are recoverable, but they should be properly vouched. The excessive trading licence fee 450*l.* is recoverable. The claim for disturbance of business can hardly be sustained without stronger evidence than that supplied at present.

As to the further claim for 7,500*l.* This damage appears to be somewhat remote. The date of the contract is not given, and no notice of it was given to the German Government, but, if it was made on the faith of the existing Treaties, and has proved a loss by reason of the breach of such Treaties, some claim may not improperly be put forward.

Law Officers of the Crown to Colonial Office.

My Lord,

Royal Courts of Justice, October 12, 1906.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. H. Bertram Cox's letter of the 12th July last, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to lay before us a despatch of the 7th May from the High Commissioner of the Western Pacific (with its enclosures) relating to a marriage ceremony performed on board a merchant-vessel by the master at Pitcairn Island, and to refer us to the Report of the 23rd November last, upon the validity of this marriage by our predecessors in office and to the papers then submitted to them, and to request the favour of our Report upon further questions arising in connection with this marriage.

That it would be seen from paragraph 3 of the High Commissioner's despatch, that at the time of the celebration of this marriage two ministers of religion (being Seventh Day Adventists) had been registered for celebrating marriages in Pitcairn under Article 118 and the following Articles of the Pacific Order in Council 1893, a fact which was unknown to your Lordship's predecessor, and, therefore, not brought under the consideration of our predecessors in office when they favoured him with the Report above mentioned.

That it would appear, at first sight, that the presence of these registered ministers on the island, assuming that one of them was so present, which there was little reason to doubt, would exclude the doctrine of "necessity" mentioned in the Report of our predecessors in office.

That it was to be observed, however, that Article 118 et seq. of the Pacific Order in Council provided for the registration of ministers of religion and not of civil marriage officers, and for the celebration of marriages by a religious and not a civil ceremony, and that if, as might possibly have been the case in the marriage now in question, members of the Church of England or some other denomination declined on conscientious grounds to be married by a minister of the Seventh Day Adventists according to the religious forms of that Sect, the question arose whether such persons were legally bound to be married by such a minister according to such forms, so as to exclude the doctrine of necessity in their case.

That it was conceived that if the Order in Council had provided for a form of civil marriage that form would have had to be complied with by all persons, whatever their religious views or conscientious scruples might be, all denominations being treated alike in this respect. But that your Lordship hesitated to endorse any suggestion that the members of one religious denomination should be compelled by law to be married according to the forms of another denomination under a penalty of their marriage being invalid.

That in this connection, Mr. Bertram Cox was to refer us to the fourth question submitted to our predecessors in office and their reply, and to suggest, for our consideration, that the Pacific Order in Council should be amended so as to provide for civil marriage officers and a civil form of marriage, either in addition to, or in substitution for, the present provisions for registered ministers of religion and marriage by religious ceremony.

That Mr. Bertram Cox was to request us to take his letter (and enclosures) into our consideration and to report:—

(1.) Whether the marriage between Walter Henry Petch and Esther Godfrey Coffin was valid and, if so, upon what grounds?

(2.) Whether Queen's Regulation 1 of 1896 applied to Pitcairn, having regard to the fact that this Regulation was passed before Pitcairn was brought within the operation of the Pacific Order in Council?

(3.) If so, what was the effect of Section 21 of that Regulation with regard to marriages contracted per verba de presenti in Pitcairn?

(4.) Whether a law which compelled members of one denomination to be married by the minister and according to the religious forms of another denomination, excluded the doctrine of necessity, and, in the event of persons disregarding the law and contracting a marriage per verba de presenti, whether such a marriage was valid?

(5.) Whether we concurred in the answers of our predecessors in office to the third and fourth questions submitted to them, and whether, with regard to the fourth question, the Pacific Order in Council should not be amended so as to provide for civil marriage officers and a civil form of marriage, as suggested in the fifth paragraph of the letter of reference?

We have taken the matters into our consideration, and, in obedience to your Lordship's commands, have the honour to

Report—

(1.) That in our opinion, the marriage of Walter Henry Petch and Esther Godfrey Coffin is valid on the ground that it was contracted in accordance with the Common Law of Pitcairn which, we think, enables a marriage per verba de presenti to be contracted without the presence of a person in holy orders.

Assuming that the presence of such a person is necessary by the Common Law of England, we think that the settlers at Pitcairn Island are subject only to so much of that law as can by possibility be applied, and their circumstances made it impossible to procure the attendance of a person in holy orders at their marriages. To that extent, therefore, the Common Law as laid down in R. v. Millis is modified in their case. The presence in the island of ministers of the Seventh Day Adventists does not affect the question, for—we presume—that they are not persons in holy orders, that is to say, episcopally ordained.

(2.) and (3.) This regulation has no bearing on the case now in question. It applied only to marriages of foreigners and of British subjects celebrated by a minister who is not a British subject. With that qualification it applies to Pitcairn Island.

(4.) As indicated in the foregoing answers, we think that the Pacific Order in Council and the Queen's Regulations do not make it necessary that all marriages should be contracted under its provisions in order to be valid. The Order provides a regular form which it is, no doubt, desirable should be used, but it does not expressly, and cannot by mere implication, invalidate marriages contracted under the Common Law.

(5.) We concur in the answer of our predecessors to the third and fourth questions submitted to them, and as regards the fourth, we think that the Order in Council should be amended so as to provide for civil marriage officers and a civil form of marriage in substitution for, or in addition to, the present provisions for a registered minister of religion and marriage by religious ceremony. If marriage by registered ministers of religion is retained, we think that power should be reserved to remove such minister from the register at the discretion of the High Commissioner.

We have, &c.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, January 31, 1906.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit herewith the papers noted in the accompanying list respecting the possibility of admitting the Portuguese Colony of Mozambique as a member of the South African Customs Union.

It will be seen that it is stated in a letter, dated the 11th November, 1903, from this Office to the Colonial Office, that apparently no claim has been made on the ground of most-favoured-nation or national treatment clauses by a Power not a member of a Customs Union to the same treatment as that accorded by one member of such Union to another, and that if such a claim were made it would probably be rejected for the reasons set out in Mr. Farnall's Memorandum of March 1889, pp. 49 and 50.

The view adopted by Mr. Farnall in this Memorandum is that a Customs Union, in order to be in a position to reject such a claim to most-favoured-nation treatment as that indicated above, must be a "complete Union," i.e., it must be established on the basis of a common Customs frontier as regards foreign nations and of the suppression of the Customs frontier as regards the States forming the Union.

In the case of the South African Union, the question arises whether, granting the necessity for the Union to be complete in the sense indicated by Mr. Farnall, it fulfils the conditions necessary to give it this character of completeness.

In paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Colonial Office letter of the 21st October, 1905, Mr. Lyttelton expresses doubts on this point, citing Articles XV, XVII, and XXII of the Customs Union Convention, which might, in his opinion, be regarded as impairing the completeness of the Union.

Among the papers transmitted will be found a list of the countries with which Treaty relations exist affecting the British Colonies, together with a Parliamentary Paper, "Commercial No. 9 (1903)," entitled "Return of Most-favoured-nation Clauses in existing Treaties of Commerce and Navigation between Great Britain and Foreign Powers, &c."

The following facts connected with negotiations now proceeding for a new Commercial Arrangement between the United Kingdom and Bulgaria show that the Government of the latter country, which is bound by the Treaty of Berlin to give most-favoured-nation treatment to the States parties to that instrument, has considered it desirable to obtain a stipulation (whether as an admission of right or as a concession is not clear) to the effect that the special privileges granted as a consequence of a Customs Union shall not constitute a breach of the most-favoured-nation Article.

The proposal originally put before the Powers by Bulgaria was as follows:—
"Il est entendu que la clause de la nation la plus favorisée ne s'appliquera pas aux faveurs spéciales résultant d'une Union Douanière."

In the course of the discussions with His Majesty's Agent and Consul-General at Sophia the Bulgarian negotiators proposed the following Article, which had already been agreed to by Germany:—

"Les dispositions qui précèdent ne s'appliquent point—

"1.
"2. Aux obligations imposées à l'une des deux Parties Contractantes par les engagements d'une Union Douanière déjà contractée ou qui pourrait l'être à l'avenir.

This wording has been adopted in the Anglo-Bulgarian draft Treaty.

I am to request you to take the papers into your consideration, and to favour me with your opinion—

1. Whether under any of the existing Treaties of Commerce a foreign Power would be entitled to claim in any of the British South African Colonies treatment for its goods as favourable as that which would be accorded to those of the Colony of Mozambique if this Colony joined the South African Customs Arrangement;

2. Whether, if the above question be answered in the affirmative, it is necessary for a Customs Union to be complete in order to disentitle countries outside the Union to most-favoured-nation treatment; and

3. Whether, if so, the South African Customs Union can, having regard to Articles XV, XVII, and XXII of the Convention, be regarded as a complete Union.

4. Generally on the matter.

Paper C. 1599 March 26, 1903.

Report.

1. Under the existing Treaties of Commerce applicable to the South African Colonies a foreign Power having the benefit of the most-favoured-nation clause would, in our opinion, be entitled to claim in any of the British South African Colonies treatment for its goods as favourable as that which would be accorded to those of the Colony of Mozambique if that Colony joined the South African Customs Arrangement.

The object of the most-favoured-nation clause is to secure to each Party to the Treaty the fiscal benefits that the other Party may give by Treaty to other nations. There is nothing in the form of the clause usually adopted to suggest that it would be inapplicable merely because the Treaty with a third Party was unusually comprehensive in its scope, unless, of course, the most-favoured-nation clause is itself made subject to an exception in favour of a Customs Union as in the cases mentioned in Mr. Farnall's Memorandum.

There seems to be no general practice of nations in favour of the suggestion made in Mr. Farnall's Memorandum to the effect that a nation may join a Customs Union with another nation and yet not bring the most-favoured-nation clause into operation by so doing.

2 and 3. In any event, we think it is doubtful whether, having regard to Articles XV, XVII, and XXII of the Convention, the South African Union can be said to be a complete Union in the sense contended for by Mr. Farnall.

4. It is, of course, to be observed that hitherto this country has always maintained a strict construction of the most-favoured-nation clause, and has contended against any construction or device that would have the effect of limiting the full scope and operation of that clause.

My Lord,

Royal Courts of Justice, August 11, 1906.

WE were honoured by your Lordship's commands, signified to us by Mr. Bertram Cox in his letter of the 20th July last, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit, for our consideration, a despatch from the High Commissioner for South Africa asking that our opinion might be obtained on two questions which had arisen as to the interpretation of Article IV of the modus vivendi between the Transvaal and Mozambique, viz:—

(i.) Did the terms of the modus vivendi as to rates, and particularly Article IV thereof, apply only to Johannesburg and stations east thereof along the Lourenço Marques-Johannesburg Line, or could they be said equally to apply to all stations in the Transvaal?

(ii.) In the event of a reduction in railway rates being effected from other ports, has the Central South African Railway Administration to give, under the terms of the modus vivendi, such a reduction to Delagoa Bay as would maintain the actual difference to be proportionate only?

That, in our opinion, of the 12th July, we dealt, inter alia, with the question of the applicability of the modus vivendi to lines constructed since it was negotiated.

That your Lordship would be glad if we would supplement that opinion by reporting on the two points now raised by Lord Selborne.

We have taken the matter into our consideration, and in obedience to your Lordship's commands, have the honour to

Report—

That, in our opinion, the terms of the modus vivendi as to rates apply only to stations between Johannesburg and Lourenço Marques on the line referred to in Article IV and not to stations on any other line. No other line is mentioned in that Article, and we can see no reason for extending the obligations of the modus vivendi to other lines.

We think that the difference to be maintained between the rates from Delagoa Bay and those from other ports is the proportionate and not the actual difference now existing between those rates. Any other construction of the modus vivendi might give rise to a discrimination much more in favour of one line by the other than appears to have been contemplated by the parties to the modus vivendi.

My Lord,

Royal Courts of Justice, November 23, 1906.

WE were honoured by your Lordship's commands, signified to us by Mr. Graham in his letter of the 8th October last, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to draw our attention to paragraph 4 of our opinion of the 12th July, in which we dealt with the question whether Article IV of the modus vivendi between the Transvaal and Mozambique applied to lines of railway constructed since the South African war.

That in connection with this matter he was now to transmit, for our consideration, an extract from a despatch from the High Commissioner for South Africa, inquiring, with reference to the new Brakpan-Witbank Line shortly to be opened, whether Article IV was to be taken to apply to traffic reaching stations on lines existing before the war over lines which in part existed before the war and in part had been constructed since the war. That the railway map at the end of the inclosed General Manager's Report for 1905 would make the point raised by the High Commissioner clear, and a copy of the modus vivendi was also inclosed for convenience of reference.

That it appeared to your Lordship to follow from our previous opinion that Article IV did not apply to such traffic, for the new route to Johannesburg via the Bethlehem-Kroonstad Line, with regard to which that opinion was given was partly over lines and to stations existing before the war and partly over lines newly constructed. That he was, however, to invite an expression of our opinion on the point raised by the High Commissioner.

We were further honoured by Mr. Graham's letter of the 17th October stating that, with reference to his letter of the 8th, he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us the copy of a despatch from the High Commissioner forwarding correspondence on the subject with the Transvaal Law Department.

We have taken the matter into our consideration and, in obedience to your Lordship's commands, have the honour to

Report—

That, in our opinion, Article IV of the modus vivendi applies only to traffic passing between Lourenço Marques and Johannesburg by the line which was in existence at the date of the modus vivendi.

RUSSIA.

No. 11.

[May 30 and August 14, 1906.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 19, 1906.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list relating to the case of the steam-ship "Knight Commander," which vessel, while on the voyage from New York to Kobe via Singapore with a miscellaneous cargo, a portion of which consisted of railway material, was captured and sunk by the Russian Vladivostock squadron on or about the 24th July, 1904.

The "Knight Commander's" papers were brought to Vladivostock, where the Port Prize Court on the 16th August, 1904, delivered judgment (Paper (A), p. 85), in which the sinking of the vessel was declared to be regular, inasmuch as by section 40 of the Russian Prize Regulations (Paper (B), p. 19) provision is made for the sinking of a prize if difficulty is experienced in taking it in for adjudication by a Prize Court.

The owners of the "Knight Commander," acting under informal advice from this Department to the effect that they should, independently of any action which His Majesty's Government might see fit to take, exhaust their own legal remedies before the Russian Prize Tribunals, appealed against the decision of the Port Prize Court, and meanwhile formulated a claim amounting to 102,733*l*, which was presented to the Russian Government on the 2nd March, 1905 (Paper (A), No. 140, p. 113), it being the view of His Majesty's late Government that the claim for compensation should be put forward irrespective of the finding of the Prize Courts. The Russian Government, however, contended that the question of compensation must rest with the Court of Appeal, and could not be considered pending the delivery of its judgment.

The appeal in the case of the "Knight Commander" came on for final hearing in the Supreme Admiralty Council at St. Petersburg on the 2nd December last, when the Court upheld the decision of the Vladivostock Prize Court condemning both ship and cargo and dismissed the appeals for compensation; and I am to inclose a despatch from His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg, forwarding the text of the judgment (Paper (C)). I am to invite your especial attention to the observations on the judgment by Mr. Hurst, Assistant Legal Adviser to this Office, who, after summarizing its main features, points out that the effect of this decision is that a large portion of the vessel's cargo was rightly condemned by the Lower Court as contraband; that this portion exceeded half the cargo; that the ship was rightly declared a prize under the Russian Rules (Paper (B), No. 11 (b), p. 3); that the action of the Russian Commander in sinking the steamer is not a circumstance for the Prize Court to deal with at all, but a matter of naval discipline; that the Russian Naval Prize Code contemplates the sinking of neutral as well as of enemy vessels; and that, despite the views put forward by international jurists of repute, the Russian Court cannot go behind the provisions of the Russian Code. The Court also find that where the destruction of a vessel is necessary in the interests of a belligerent, parties interested ought not to suffer; but that since both the "Knight Commander" and her cargo have been adjudged prizes, the chief loss falls upon the captor State, and that owners of innocent property must recover compensation by initiating claims before a Prize Court.

The destruction of the "Knight Commander," as you are no doubt aware, provoked great indignation in this country at the time of its occurrence, and His Majesty's late Ministry characterised the incident in both Houses of Parliament as unjustifiable in international law, and pledged themselves to support claims for compensation irrespective of the finding of the Russian Courts. In this connection I am to refer you to the debates in both Houses of Parliament on the 11th August, 1904, and to Mr. Balfour's answer to Mr. Gibson Bowles on the 8th August, 1904 (Paper (A), p. 37).

I am to request that you will take these papers into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir Edward Grey with your opinion on the following points:—

1. Can His Majesty's Government, notwithstanding the finding of the Supreme Admiralty Council, further press the claim (which is still in the possession of the Russian Government) on their consideration, and, if so, what further arguments can they use beyond those already advanced (see especially despatch to Sir C. Hardinge, No. 93, Treaty, of the 10th August, 1904 (Paper (A), p. 41))?

2. In the not improbable event of the Russian Government declining to consider the claim, is it desirable that His Majesty's Government should propose that it be submitted to arbitration by a special Tribunal constituted for this purpose? In this connection I am to refer you to Sir C. Hardinge's Memorandum, and the Minutes thereon which are printed on p. 23 of the Papers, which were forwarded to you for perusal on the 1st February last, and of which another copy is inclosed (Paper (D)). From that Memorandum you will observe that Count Lamsdorff thought it unlikely that the Russian Judicial authorities would delegate these functions to a Court of Arbitration, and was of opinion that it would be better to wait till the second Hague Conference had pronounced itself on the question of principle relating to the destruction of prizes, both neutral and enemy. This is one of the subjects set down for discussion at the forthcoming Peace Conference at The Hague, but it is to be presumed that it will not be within the functions of the Conference to lay down what the law is at the time when it is sitting, and still less to declare what the law was when this case arose, so that the view held by the Conference shall be applied retrospectively to matters which took place before the date of its assembly was even fixed.

3. If you are of opinion that the case of the "Knight Commander" is one in which arbitration may eventually be proposed, I am to request that Sir E. Grey may be favoured with your views as to what particular points should be submitted to the Arbitrators.

4. Sir E. Grey would at the same time be glad to be furnished with any observations of a general character which you may desire to offer upon the papers now submitted to you.

Report.

In our opinion His Majesty's Government is justified in pressing the claim for compensation in this case on the consideration of the Russian Government. The decision of the Supreme Admiralty Council is founded entirely upon the Russian Naval Prize Regulations and instructions to naval officers, and it may well be that the Russian Courts have quite correctly construed these documents, but the real question is whether or not they are in conformity with international law. The Supreme Admiralty Council justifies its decision as being correct both according to Russian law and international law; but, so far as considerations of international law are concerned, the Council, according to its own view, could not act upon them. It finds that the question of the regularity of the sinking of a vessel according to the interpretation of the Russian law relating to prizes is a matter only for the superior officer of the person who had given the order for the sinking, and not for a Prize Court; and it appears from Count Lamsdorff's note of the 11th August, 1904, that the decision of the Russian Government is in favour of its officers. The case therefore becomes one with the Russian Government itself, on the ground that it authorizes its officers to act in a manner which, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, is at variance with the principles of international law. In any representation to be made to the Russian Government it should be indicated that the complaint of His Majesty's Government is against the Russian Government, and not made by way of appeal against the Supreme Admiralty Council, although its decision is not approved by His Majesty's Government.

2. In the event of the claim being rejected by the Russian Government, that Government should, in our opinion, be invited to join in submitting the claim to arbitration by a special Tribunal constituted for that purpose. The discussion of the subject by The Hague Conference would be an indifferent substitute for the decision of a specially appointed Tribunal, for the Conference is not likely to declare what the law was when this case arose, and any principles which it might recommend for adoption in the future would not in any way conclude this case. Moreover, if this case were to be made to depend on the action of The Hague Conference the attitude of the British Representative at the Conference in favour of the principle contended for by Great Britain would be open to the misrepresentation that he was merely trying to influence the Conference in order to assist his country in the prosecution of its claim against Russia, and the Conference would no doubt be extremely sensitive to any suggestion that it was being made an instrument for this purpose.

3. The substance of the questions to be submitted to the Arbitration Tribunal is:—

(1.) Whether the sinking of the "Knight Commander" by Russian naval officers is justified by the generally recognized principles of international law.

(2.) The assessment of compensation to be paid by Russia in respect of the ship and cargo in the event of the destruction being held to be illegal.

The exact forms of the questions, however, could be settled with more certainty on receipt of the final answer of the Russian Government.

4. Generally,—It is unfortunate that, on the merits of the case, it seems clear that the "Knight Commander" would have been properly condemned and confiscated if she had been taken in for adjudication in the ordinary way. We have not before us any complete statement by the owners or master, but, judging from the proceedings, the apparently undisputed facts are:—

- (1.) The bulk of the cargo was destined for use in Japanese military operations;
- (2.) The owners were privy to the carriage of contraband; and
- (3.) There was either destruction, concealment, or wrongful conduct relating to the ship's documents.

These are circumstances which will probably have some—though little, if any, legitimate—weight with the Arbitration Tribunal when it comes to consider the question of damages.

The owners of the ship can scarcely be said to be meritorious claimants, but the question of damages in this case is of much less importance than the principle of international law which is involved, and His Majesty's Government ought to succeed in obtaining a declaration of that principle.

If the case of the "Knight Commander" is submitted to arbitration, consideration should be given to the question whether the same Tribunal should be empowered to deal with any other claims which His Majesty's Government may have against the Russian Government arising out of losses to British shipping during the late war between Russia and Japan.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.Foreign Office, July 27, 1906.

Gentlemen,

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to inform you that on receipt of your Report of the 30th May last in the case of the steam-ship "Knight Commander" (Paper (A)) a despatch in the sense of the first paragraph thereof was addressed to His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg (Paper (B)), instructing him to address a further representation to the Russian Government, and to invite their reconsideration of the claim for compensation put forward by the owners of the vessel.

A copy of Sir A. Nicolson's note to the Russian Government is annexed (Paper (C)), and I am also to inclose a copy of the reply which his Excellency has now received (Paper (D)), to the effect that the Russian Ministry for Foreign Affairs do not find sufficient grounds for altering the view expressed in their notes of the 5th (18th) December, 1905 (Papers (E) and (F)), on the cases of the steam-ships "Allanton," "Calchas," and "Hipsang," as to the fitness of diplomatic interference in Prize Court justice, and also on the question of the principles obtaining at present in the science of international law relative to the sinking of neutral ships by belligerents.

Sir E. Grey desires me to state that, with your concurrence, he proposes now to take action in the sense of the second and third paragraphs of your Report of the 30th May, viz., to invite the Russian Government to join in submitting the claim to arbitration by a special Tribunal constituted for that purpose. I am accordingly to request that you will be so good as to define the questions which in that case it would, in your opinion, be desirable to submit for arbitration by the Tribunal in question.

In addition to the papers above mentioned, those forwarded to you in my letter of the 19th April last are also inclosed for convenience of reference.

I have, &c.

Report.

In our opinion the reply of the Russian Government does not require any alteration or addition to the substance of the questions indicated in our Report of the 30th May, 1906, and these questions may be expressed as follows:—

1. Whether the sinking of the "Knight Commander" by Russian naval officers was justified by the generally recognized principles of international law.
2. If the sinking of the "Knight Commander" was not so justified, what damages should be paid by Russia to the owners of the ship and cargo?

In view of the difficulties which may arise in the presentation of the British Case, as to this vessel, to the Tribunal, we think it right to call attention to the last paragraph of our former Report.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 9, 1906.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State, to transmit to you the accompanying papers relating to claims put forward by the owners of the steam-ships "Calchas" and "Allanton" against the Russian Government in respect of the seizure and detention of these vessels during the recent war between Russia and Japan.

The particulars in regard to these vessels are summarized in a reference made by this Department to your predecessors on the 31st August, 1905—Paper (A), pp. 1 and 3—respecting the general question of claims pending against the Russian Government in respect of British vessels captured, sunk, or otherwise destroyed by the public ships of Russia in the course of that war; and the Report of the late Law Officers, to the effect that the claims in these two cases might be presented to the Russian Government through the diplomatic channel, will be found on pp. 9 and 10 of that Paper.

In consequence of that Report His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg was instructed on the 27th November, 1905, to address notes to the Russian Government respecting the claims advanced. Copies of these notes are annexed (Papers (B) and (C)).

The reply of the Russian Government to these notes will be found in Paper (D), and amounted to a categorical refusal to deal through the diplomatic channel with the claims so put forward.

In the letter from this Department of the 1st ultimo, a copy of printed correspondence relating to these and other similar claims against the Russian Government was inclosed for your perusal. A further copy is inclosed herewith, and I am also to call your attention to the correspondence with Messrs. Holt and Co. and with the West of England Steam-ship Owners' Protection and Indemnity Association, which has taken place since the reply of the Russian Government was received. This correspondence, with the Minutes thereon, is marked on pp. 17, 21, 25, 28, and 60 of the Print (Paper (E)).*

It will be seen from the Minutes above referred to that, in view of the attitude of the Russian Government, the Secretary of State is inclined to the opinion that the claims in the case of the "Calchas" and "Allanton," put forward through the diplomatic channel, cannot well be further pressed. Letters have accordingly been prepared to Messrs. Holt and Co. and the West of England Association, informing them to this effect. Drafts of these letters are inclosed herewith (Papers (F) and (G)), and I have the honour to inquire whether, in your opinion, the terms of these drafts are, in the circumstances, right and proper.

I am further to state that Sir E. Grey would also be glad to receive any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer with respect to the claims above referred to.

I have, &c.

Report.

With regard to the "Calchas," we are unable to concur in the statement that there is no question of principle at stake. The facts, as laid before us, disclose four points on which questions of principle may well be raised:—

1. The removal by the captors of 2,000 bags of flour, part of the vessel's cargo, at Kovsakovsky without any order from the Prize Court (assuming that there was no consent to their proceeding on the part of the captain, as to which the statement of facts is not quite clear);
2. The unexplained and apparently unreasonable delay in bringing the vessel to trial; and
3. The omission on the part of the Russian Government to provide a Prize Court having jurisdiction to deal with claims for damage arising under either of the two preceding heads;
4. The operation of Article 30 of the Russian Prize Regulations, as construed by Count Lamsdorff in his note of the 5th December, 1905, which precluded a Russian Prize Court from entertaining claims for compensation owing to irregularity and delay in the method of capture, where the fact of such capture was held to be justifiable.

In the draft letter it is stated that the practice of English Prize Courts is only to award costs and damages where it can be shown that a capture has been effected without ostensible cause or reason. This is not strictly correct, for English Prize Courts have laid frequent and emphatic stress on the necessity, incumbent on the captor, of bringing the vessel before the Prize Court without undue delay, and where the captor has been guilty of such delay, he has been made to pay damages. There is therefore no inconsistency in making a claim for damages for delay in bringing the vessel in for adjudication, although the seizure has been held to be justified.

We are unable to say from the facts before us whether the delay was due to the captor or the Prize Court. In the former case, the claim would be one proper for a Prize Court, if a Court with competent jurisdiction is available for that purpose. In the latter case, the claim would properly be put forward through diplomatic channels.

The delay of forty-nine days from the date of seizure to the date of adjudication seems prima facie unreasonable, especially having regard to the greater dispatch given in the case of the German vessel.

The principle above stated, in reference to delay by a captor, is one of international law, and should be acted on by Russian Prize Courts as well as English.

The view expressed by Count Lamsdorff in his note to Mr. Spring-Rice of the 5th December, 1905, of the effect of Article 30 of the Russian Prize Regulations would, if accepted by the Prize Court, preclude that Court from entertaining a claim for demurrage like that now in question, in face of its finding that the arrest and detention of the "Calchas" was justified. We think Count Lamsdorff's construction of Article 30 is probably correct. In that case the Russian law does not afford a remedy allowed by international law, and the failure to afford such a remedy raises a substantial question of principle.

In the case of the "Allanton" there does not seem to have been much delay in bringing her in, and although therefore the same questions of principle under Article 30 of the Prize Regulations arise, there does not appear to be any case upon which a claim for damage could be successfully maintained.

Generally: The manner in which the right of search was exercised during the late war seems to render it expedient that an effort should be made to secure by international agreement the right of adequate compensation for delay in all cases where the search turns out to have been mistaken.

Draft of Letter to Messrs. Holt and Co.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office,

1906.

IN my letter of the 19th January last you were informed of the communication which His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg had received from the Russian Government, setting forth the grounds on which they found themselves unable to consider the claim made through the diplomatic channel for compensation in respect of the seizure and detention of the steam-ship "Calchas."

The question of what, if any, further action on your behalf could be taken in the matter has since been very carefully considered by His Majesty's Government in consultation with the Law Officers of the Crown, and I am now directed by Secretary Sir E. Grey to inform you that, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, there is no probability that the Russian Government would accept any proposal made by them to submit the matter to arbitration, since there is no question of principle at stake, and since the procedure followed by the Russian authorities in their treatment of the vessel was in accordance with Russian Prize Law, as laid down in the Russian Naval Prize Regulations of 1895.

The fact must, moreover, be remembered that the Supreme Admiralty Council, the highest Court of Appeal in Russia, acting doubtless in good faith and uninfluenced by any corrupt motive, has found, as a result of its deliberations, that the capture of the "Calchas" was justified, and, that being so, it followed as a natural consequence that the Court itself awarded no compensation. It cannot be maintained that the Court should have acted otherwise, for to award damages against the captor in such a case would be obviously inconsistent with its finding. In English Prize Court cases it appears to have been the practice only to award costs and damages where it can be shown that a capture has been effected without ostensible cause or reason, which, in the case of the "Calchas," the Court have not so found.

His Majesty's Government, as you are aware, have already pointed out to the Russian Government that, in their opinion, the claim put forward by you was such as to merit equitable consideration at the hands of the Imperial Government, but since the latter have found themselves unable to entertain this view it appears now to be practically impossible to obtain the compensation claimed on the ground of the undue detention of the vessel.

In these circumstances His Majesty's Government have reluctantly come to the conclusion that it would be useless further to press through the diplomatic channel the claim put forward in the case of the "Calchas." They have arrived at this decision with the more regret, inasmuch as it was largely due to the interest shown by His Majesty's Government in the case that the vessel was released on appeal by the Prize Court of Second Instance.

Gentlemen,

WITH reference to your letter of the 18th January last and 27th ultimo, respecting the case of the steam-ship "Allanton," I am directed by Secretary Sir E. Grey to refer to my letter of the 17th January last, in which you were informed of the communication which His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg had received from the Russian Government, setting forth the grounds on which they found themselves unable to consider the claim made through the diplomatic channel for compensation in respect of the seizure and detention of the steam-ship "Allanton."

The question of what, if any, further action in the matter could be taken on behalf of the owner of the vessel has since been very carefully considered by His Majesty's Government in consultation with the Law Officers of the Crown; and I am now directed by Secretary Sir E. Grey to inform you that, in their opinion, there is no probability that the Russian Government would accept any proposal which might be made by them to submit the matter to arbitration, since there is no question of principle at stake, and since the procedure followed by the Russian authorities in their treatment of the vessel was in accordance with Russian Prize Law, as laid down in the Russian Naval Prize Regulations of 1895.

His Majesty's Government, as you were informed in my letter from this Department of the 22nd November, 1905, have already instructed His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg to express the earnest hope that the claim of the owner of the "Allanton" might be favourably considered by the Russian Government, but in view of the categorical refusal of the latter to entertain this proposal it appears now to be practically impossible to obtain the compensation claimed for the seizure and detention of the vessel.

I am to state that, in these circumstances, His Majesty's Government have reluctantly come to the conclusion that it would be useless further to press through the diplomatic channel the claim put forward in the case of the "Allanton."

Gentlemen,

SIR E. GREY has duly considered your Report of the 16th June last, favouring him with your opinion with regard to letters which it was proposed to address to Messrs. Holt and Co. and the West of England Steam-ship Owners' Protection and Indemnity Association, respecting the claims put forward against the Russian Government in the cases of the steam-ships "Calchas" and "Allanton."

I have now the honour to transmit to you drafts of the proposed letters (Papers A and B) as amended in accordance with the views expressed by you, as well as the draft of a despatch which Sir E. Grey proposes to address to His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg (Paper C), instructing him to make a further representation to the Russian Government in the case of the "Calchas."

I am to request that Sir E. Grey may be favoured at an early date with your opinion whether the terms of these drafts are right and proper.

For convenience of reference the papers which accompanied my previous letter of the Department of the 9th March are returned herewith.

Draft of Letter to Messrs. Holt and Co.

Gentlemen,

IN my letter of the 19th January last you were informed of the communication which His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg had received from the Russian Government, setting forth the grounds on which they found themselves unable to consider the claim made through the diplomatic channel for compensation in respect of the seizure and detention of the steam-ship "Calchas."

The question of what, if any, further action on your behalf could be taken in the matter has since been very carefully considered by His Majesty's Government, in consultation with the Law Officers of the Crown; and I am now directed by Secretary Sir Edward Grey to inform you that it appears to His Majesty's Government that the facts of the case disclose four points on which questions of principle might justly be raised.

(1.) The removal by the captors of 2,000 bags of flour, part of the vessel's cargo, at Korsakovsky, without any order from the Prize Court. As regards this particular point, it would appear from the Master's letter to you of December 1904 that his consent was obtained under threat of compulsion.

(2.) The unexplained and apparently unreasonable delay in bringing the "Calchas" to trial before the Prize Court at Vladivostok.

(3.) The omission on the part of the Russian Government to make provision in the Naval Prize Regulations for a Prize Court having jurisdiction to deal with claims for damage arising under the preceding head, and

(4.) The operation of Article 30 of the Russian Prize Regulations, as construed by the Russian Government, which precluded such Court from entertaining claims for compensation owing to irregularity and delay in the method of capture, where such capture was held to be justifiable.

In these circumstances His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg has been instructed to press the foregoing considerations upon the Russian Government, and to renew the demand for compensation on your behalf.

If the Russian Government admit the validity of the points urged by His Majesty's Government, and are willing to make a monetary payment, it will probably be necessary to reduce and amend the claim you forwarded to the Secretary of State on the 26th July, 1905, as that claim was drawn up on the footing that the seizure of the vessel was wrongful, and that you were entitled to compensation for the entire period from the arrest of the ship to her liberation, and not merely for the delay in bringing her to trial.

(B.)

Draft of Letter to West of England Steam-ship Owners' Protection and Indemnity Association.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, 1906.

WITH reference to your letters of the 18th January last and 27th ultimo, respecting the case of the steam-ship "Allanton," I am directed by Secretary Sir E. Grey to refer to my letter of the 17th January last, in which you were informed of the communication which His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg had received from the Russian Government, setting forth the grounds on which they found themselves unable to consider the claim made through the diplomatic channel for compensation in respect of the seizure and detention of the steam-ship "Allanton."

The fact must, moreover, be remembered that the Supreme Admiralty Council—the highest Court of Appeal in Russia—acting, doubtless, in good faith, and uninfluenced by any corrupt motive, has found as a result of its deliberations that the capture of the "Allanton" was justified, and, that being so, it followed as a natural consequence that the Court itself awarded no compensation. I am to state that, in these circumstances, His Majesty's Government have reluctantly come to the conclusion that it would be useless further to press through the diplomatic channel the claim put forward in the case of the "Allanton."

Draft of Despatch to Sir A. Nicolson.

Sir,

Foreign Office, 1906.

IN his despatch No. 134, Treaty, of the 20th December last, Mr. Spring-Rice forwarded to me a translation of a note from Count Lamsdorff, dated the 5th (18th) of that month on the subject of the claim put forward by His Majesty's Government on behalf of the owners and other persons interested in the steam-ship "Calchas" against the Russian Government in connection with the seizure and detention of that vessel by the Russian naval authorities in 1904. In that note Count Lamsdorff stated that his Government adhered to their view that the seizure and detention of the "Calchas" having been declared by the Supreme Prize Court to be in accordance with the provisions of the Russian Naval Prize Regulations, the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, as an administrative Department, could not interfere with the jurisdiction of the Special Prize Courts constituted by those regulations, and could therefore take no cognizance of any claims for compensation arising out of the seizure and detention of the vessels which might be presented to them through the diplomatic channel.

His Majesty's Government having carefully considered the case of the "Calchas" in communication with their legal advisers, regret that they are unable to share the view taken by the Russian Government. It appears to them that the facts disclose four points on which questions of principle may justly be raised:—

(1.) The removal by the captors of 2,000 bags of flour, part of the vessel's cargo, at Korsakovsky, without any order from the Prize Court. As regards this point, it is asserted by the Russian Government that the consent of the Master of the "Calchas" to the removal of the flour was obtained, but that officer has stated in writing that such consent was obtained under threat of compulsion, and it can scarcely be contended that his consent, obtained under such circumstances, was voluntary.

RUSSIA.—SIAM.

(3.) The omission on the part of the Russian Government to make provision in the Naval Prize Regulations for a Court having jurisdiction to deal with claims for damage arising under either of the two preceding heads.

(4.) The operation of Article 30 of the Russian Prize Regulations, as construed by Count Lamsdorff in his note to Mr. Spring-Rice of the 5th (18th) December, 1905, which precluded a Russian Prize Court from entertaining claims for compensation owing to irregularity and delay in the method of capture, where the fact of such capture was held to be justifiable. In this connection His Majesty's Government would observe that British Prize Courts have in the past laid frequent and emphatic stress on the necessity, incumbent upon the captor, of bringing a captured vessel before the competent Prize Court without undue delay; and in cases in which such delay has occurred, have awarded damages against the captor. In these circumstances His Majesty's Government are of opinion that they are warranted in presenting a claim for damages for delay in bringing the "Calchas" before a Prize Court for adjudication, even though that Court has held that her seizure was justified. They desire, moreover, to impress upon the Russian Government that, as has already been pointed out in the Marquess of Lansdowne's despatch to Sir Charles Hardinge, No. 214, Treaty, of the 21st November, 1904, the delay of forty-six days from the date of the seizure of the "Calchas" to the date of the decision of the Vladivostok Prize Court is, prima facie, unreasonable, especially having regard to the greater dispatch shown in dealing with the case of the German steam-ship "Arabia," which latter vessel was seized on or about the same date as the "Calchas," and was released by a decision of the Vladivostok Prize Court on the 3rd August, 1904. The principle above stated, with regard to undue delay by a captor, is, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, one of international law, and, as such, should be binding equally upon Russian and British Prize Courts.

His Majesty's Government also consider that the view expressed by Count Lamsdorff in his note to Mr. Spring-Rice of the 5th (18th) December, 1905, of the effect of Article 30 of the Russian Prize Regulations would, if accepted by the Prize Court, preclude the latter from entertaining a claim for demurrage similar to that now in question, in face of its finding that the arrest and detention of the "Calchas" were justified. His Majesty's Government do not desire to imply that the construction put upon Article 30 by Count Lamsdorff is not correct, but in that case it appears to them that Russian law does not afford a remedy sanctioned by international law, and the failure to afford such remedy raises, in their opinion, a substantial question of principle.

His Majesty's Government therefore deem it their duty to press the foregoing considerations upon the Russian Government, and, in communicating them to M. Istolsky, I request that your Excellency will express the hope of His Majesty's Government that, upon reconsideration of the case, the Russian Government will be prepared to admit their justice, and will award compensation for the losses which these irregularities have imposed on the owners of the vessel.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.Foreign Office, February 13, 1906.

Gentlemen,

Draft Siam
Order in Council.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit to you the draft of a Siam Order in Council under the provisions of "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," in substitution for the existing Siam Order in Council of 1903.

The draft Order is based on and largely reproduces the existing Order of 1903, but a fresh Order in Council has been rendered necessary by the fact that the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury have agreed to the appointment of a second Judge of the British Court for Siam.

This appointment will render it unnecessary to continue the system of appeals from the Court for Siam to the Supreme Court at Singapore, an arrangement which has not been a success, and appeals will, under the draft Order, lie from the decisions of either of the Judges to the two sitting together at Bangkok as the "full Court."

The opportunity has also been taken to introduce certain other amendments which experience has shown to be desirable.

Under the 1903 Order, First and Second Assistants in the Consular Service for Siam cannot hold District Courts, but, as the Secretary of State considers that some of them are qualified to do so, the definition of "Consular Officer" has been extended to enable them to do so in future.

Article 14 of the draft takes the place of Article 9 of the 1903 Order, and is a return to the system enacted in Article 8 of the Siam Order in Council, 1889, as the provisions of the 1903 Order as to District Courts were not found to be suitable to the present conditions in Siam, where there are only two Consular districts—viz., Bangkok and Chiangmai. Under Article 12, jurisdiction in the former is vested exclusively in the Court for Siam, and there is therefore no District Court. The latter, the Chiangmai district, constitutes the district of the International Court, in which jurisdiction under the Order remains in abeyance until a case has been transferred from the International Court to the extra-territorial Court. There are, consequently, at present no District Courts in Siam at all, and considerable inconvenience is the result, which will be obviated by returning to the system of the 1889 Order, under which the Minister can designate the places at which District Courts are to be held, and the limits of their jurisdiction.

Various alterations have also been made in Part 6 ("Registration of British Subjects"), to meet suggestions that have been offered by the Consular Officers in Siam, and are based on their experience of the working of the registration provisions in that country.

I am to request that you will take these papers into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to whether the terms of the draft Order are fit and proper for submission for the approval of His Majesty in Council, and also with such general observations as you may desire to offer on the matter.

The officer who has been selected for the appointment of Assistant Judge of the Court for Siam has already started for Siam, but his actual appointment cannot be made until the new Order has received His Majesty's approval. I am therefore to add that Sir E. Grey will be glad if you will favour him with a reply to this letter at your early convenience.

In our opinion, the accompanying draft Order in Council, as initialled by us, may properly be submitted to the King for the approval of His Majesty in Council. Perhaps attention should be drawn to an important difference between Article 41 of the new Order and the same Article in the old Order. Under the new Order power is conferred on the Court to send persons without qualification charged to Singapore for trial. In the old Order, only British subjects could be so sent. This seems a somewhat considerable extension of the power of the Court, but it is in conformity with the provisions of section 6 of "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890."

Gentlemen,
 I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list, which relate to a claim arising out of a collision between the British steam-ship "Valencia" and the Spanish gun-boat "Doña Maria de Molina."

Claim on account of collision between "Valencia" and "Doña
 Maria de Molina."

An account of the circumstances in which the claim arose is given in a letter of the 11th May, 1905, from Messrs. Bateson, Warr, and Wimshurst, the solicitors of the owners of the "Valencia." From this it will be seen that on the 27th May, 1904, the Spanish gun-boat "Doña Maria de Molina" collided, in the port of Santa Cruz de Tenerife, with the "Valencia," which was properly moored there, and caused considerable damage to the vessel and her cargo. The Commander of the gun-boat admitted that he was entirely to blame in the matter. The claim for compensation presented by the owners of the "Valencia" was brought before the Maritime Department at Cadiz, who acquitted the Commander of the gun-boat of blame, and decreed the provisional suspension of the case, admitting, however, "that the owners of the 'Valencia' would probably pursue, by the legal procedure open to them, the claims they had brought forward, the grounds for which, contained in the circumstances of the case, had been but little examined."

From a Report on the case furnished by the legal adviser to His Majesty's Embassy at Madrid (see Sir M. de Bunsen's despatch No. 58 of the 28th ultimo), it appears that it would be possible for the owners of the "Valencia" to apply for a reopening of the case, but that, though responsibility for the collision might then be brought home to the Commander of the Spanish gun-boat, it is very questionable whether, in Spanish law, the State could be made liable for the damage caused by the collision. It is suggested, at the same time, that little advantage would accrue to the injured parties from pressing their claim against the Commander in person, who, in contemplation of Spanish law, seems to be alone liable to pay compensation.

If this is a correct statement of the Spanish law in the matter, and there seems to be no reason to doubt the conclusion arrived at by Señor Azcarate, it appears to the Secretary of State to reveal a state of things most unsatisfactory to British subjects (or others) whose ships or cargo may have suffered damage from collision with Spanish public vessels. Indeed, to put an extreme case, were a Spanish torpedo-boat destroyer to run into, at full speed, and sink an ocean-going mail steamer on the high seas, doing damage, perhaps, to the amount of 300,000*l.* or more, the owners of the steamer would, it appears, in Spanish law, have no redress, except against the Commander of the destroyer, who would probably have little or nothing more than his scanty pay from which to make compensation.

In these circumstances Sir E. Grey would be glad to be favoured with your opinion (1) whether he would be justified in making a representation to the Spanish Government in connection with the case of the "Valencia," and, if so (2), on what grounds such representation should properly be based.

Sir E. Grey will be glad, at the same time, to be favoured with any observations of a more general nature on the case of the "Valencia" which you may be disposed to offer.

Report.

1. We think that you would be justified in making a representation to the Spanish Government in this case, but such representation should not be based upon a supposed defect in Spanish law in regard to the matter.

The law of Spain in relation to the liability of King's ships in cases of damage done by them appears to be identical in form with that of England. According to English law, legal responsibility in such cases attaches to the actual wrong-doer only, that is, the officer to whose negligence or misconduct the damage is to be attributed, and he alone can be sued. It is, however, the practice in England, in the interests of justice, for the Admiralty to undertake the defence of any proceedings against the officer sued, and to accept responsibility for any damages that may be awarded by the Court in an action against the officer.

Accordingly, we think that you may make a representation to the Spanish Government with a view to their accepting responsibility in the matter in the event of the gun-boat being found to be to blame.

2. Such representation should be based upon general grounds, founded upon the commercial and other interests of the respective countries, and upon the particular ground that, in a similar case of damage caused by one of His Majesty's ships, the British Government would accept responsibility.

Upon the facts it would seem clear that the gun-boat was to blame, but, assuming that the Spanish Government accept responsibility, it may be necessary to have the case reopened with a view to the fact that the gun-boat was at fault being established.

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

THE Secretary of State desires to be advised by the Law Officers of the Crown in regard to a question which has arisen in connection with the interpretation of section 6 of "The Naturalization Act, 1870."

That enactment provides as follows:—

"Any British subject who has at any time before or may at any time after the passing of this Act, when in any foreign State and not under any disability, voluntarily become naturalized in such State shall, from and after the time of his so having become naturalized in such foreign State, be deemed to have ceased to be a British subject and be regarded as an alien."

Cancellation

 United States
 naturalization.

UNITED STATES.

His Majesty's Consul-General at San Francisco has recently reported that the Courts in that district have cancelled many American certificates of citizenship on the ground that the certificates were obtained by means of false and fraudulent declarations, and that, between August 1905 and February 1906, some twenty-four persons, formerly British subjects, have thus lost their American citizenship.

The question therefore arises as to the present status, in English law, of these persons.

These persons took all the necessary steps to acquire naturalization in the United States, presumably with the full intention and desire of renouncing their allegiance to the British Crown; and it would seem that they were for all practical purposes aliens in contemplation of English law down to the date of the cancellation of their certificates of citizenship. If any question as to their nationality had arisen in the Courts in this country before that date it is difficult to see how any other decision than that they were aliens could have been arrived at; and it would seem that, having become aliens, they could only have regained British nationality under the provisions of section 8 of the Act in regard to readmission.

Further, Article I of the Treaty between the United Kingdom and the United States dated the 13th May, 1870, runs as follows:—

"British subjects who have become, or shall become, and are naturalized according to law within the United States of America as citizens thereof shall, subject to the provisions of Article II, be held by Great Britain to be in all respects and for all purposes citizens of the United States, and shall be treated as such by Great Britain.

"Reciprocally, citizens of the United States of America who have become, or shall become, and are naturalized according to law within the British dominions as British subjects shall, subject to the provisions of Article II, be held by the United States to be in all respects and for all purposes British subjects, and shall be treated as such by the United States."

Presumably the grant of a certificate of citizenship renders a person "naturalized according to law within the United States of America as a citizen thereof," and the obligation of the British Government under the Treaty would begin as from the date of the grant and would involve the recognition of the grantee as an alien in English law.

On the other hand, the legal adviser of the British Embassy at Washington advises (though he is not aware of the circumstances of the particular cases) that the judicial decree of cancellation is based on the same principles as govern the cancellation by the Courts on the ground of fraud of any deed or instrument, and has the effect of adjudging that the party never was entitled to naturalization and never, therefore, became lawfully a citizen of the United States, and of declaring his naturalization as an American citizen void ab initio.

It has been suggested that the words "voluntarily become naturalized" in section 6 of "The Naturalization Act, 1870," mean "voluntarily become effectively naturalized," and that a naturalization which is thus declared void ab initio or is capable of being so declared is not effective. This theory might involve considerable practical difficulty as to the nationality to which the parties could claim to belong, between the grant and the cancellation of the certificates of American nationality, and would seem to leave that nationality in doubt until by some process the certificates were declared either good or bad.

The Secretary of State desires the opinion of the Law Officers:—

1. Whether the persons in question became, on the facts stated, aliens in pursuance of section 6 of the Naturalization Act;

2. If the answer to (1) is in the affirmative, whether on their naturalization as American citizens being declared void ab initio they revert to British nationality, without recourse to the provisions of section 8 of the Act in regard to readmission; or whether they are left in the position—not uncommon—of possessing no nationality.

Opinion.

The first question must be answered in the affirmative and the second in the negative. We understand that upon the grant of the certificates the persons in question became, according to American law, American naturalized citizens, and, in our opinion, they thereupon became, under section 6 of "The Naturalization Act, 1870," aliens to this country. The subsequent avoidance of their American nationality cannot, in our opinion, operate to re-vest in them their former British nationality.

Law Officers of the Crown to the Earl of Elgin.

My Lord,

Law Officers' Department, October 20, 1906.

WE were honoured by your Lordship's commands signified to us by Mr. Bertram Cox in his letter of the 28th August last, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to lay before us copies of communications which have passed between His Majesty's Government and the United States' Government as to the conditions in which the American liberty of fishery on the coasts of Newfoundland, under Article I of the Convention of the 20th October, 1818, was to be exercised.

That it would probably be necessary to consult us before a reply was returned to the last communication of the United States' Government, but that in the meantime he was to state that, owing to the great divergence of view between the two Governments which that communication disclosed, it has been decided by His Majesty's Government, pending further discussion of the questions involved, and without prejudice to such discussion or to the rights and claims of either party, to endeavour to make with the United States' Government a provisional arrangement in the nature of a modus vivendi, which would enable the winter herring fishery (principally in the Bay of Islands) due to begin in the second half of October to be carried on in peace and good order.

That His Majesty's Government had not yet been able to obtain the consent of the Colonial Government to the making of such an arrangement, and it has consequently become necessary to consider how far His Majesty's Government were in a position to give effect to any such arrangement, independently of the consent and authority of the Colonial Government.

That the text of the Convention would be found on pp. 273-274 of the Cabinet print of 1852, and that on pp. 274-276 would be found the text of the Act 59 Geo. III, cap. 38, and the text of the Order in Council made under that Act on the 19th June, 1819.

That by section 1 of the Act His Majesty was empowered to make by Order in Council "such regulations and to give such directions, orders, and instructions to the Governor of Newfoundland, or to any officer or officers on that station, or to any other person or persons whomsoever as shall or may be from time to time deemed proper and necessary for the carrying into effect the purposes of the said Convention, with relation to the taking, drying, and curing of fish by inhabitants of the United States of America, in common with British subjects, within the limits set forth in the said Article of the said Convention, and hereinbefore recited; any Act or Acts of Parliament, or any law, custom, or usage to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding."

That by the Order in Council of the 19th June, 1819, the Governor of Newfoundland was instructed to "give notice to all His Majesty's subjects being in or resorting to the said ports that they are not to interrupt in any manner the aforesaid fishery so as aforesaid allowed to be carried on by the inhabitants of the United States in common with His Majesty's subjects on the said coasts, within the limits assigned to them by the said Treaty"; and it was further ordered "that the Governor of Newfoundland do conform himself to the said Treaty, and to such instructions as he shall from time to time receive thereon in conformity to the said Treaty, and to the above-cited Act, from one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State."

That this Order in Council was still in force, and its significance was discussed with reference to the provisions of "The Newfoundland Foreign Fishing-Vessels Act, 1905," to which objection had been taken by the United States' Government in the Report of our predecessors of the 21st November last.

That our predecessors were of opinion that while the Order in Council applied to officials as well as to private persons, the fact that the acts complained of were authorized by an Act of the local Legislature would probably be an answer to any proceedings in respect of an infringement of the Order in Council, and that the provisions of the Order in Council were of so general a nature that it was doubtful whether the provisions of the local Act would be held void as repugnant to orders made under the authority of an Imperial Act of Parliament within 28-29 Vict., cap. 63, sec. 2.

That the Legislature of Newfoundland had this year passed an Act which enacted that the provisions of the Act of 1905 with reference to which the above opinion was given should not be applied to vessels exercising Treaty rights of fishery, but that as the Act of 1906 was expressed as requiring the approval and confirmation of His Majesty in Council before it was brought into operation, and that as it might be necessary or expedient to allow it to remain in suspense as part of the proposed modus vivendi if not for other reasons, your Lordship would be glad to have our advice as to whether it would be lawful for His Majesty in Council, under the Act of 1819, to give instructions to the same effect, i.e., to direct that the provisions of "The Foreign Fishing-Vessels Act, 1905," in question should not be applied or be held to be applicable to vessels from which inhabitants of the United States exercised the liberty of fishing under the Convention of 1818.

That on this point there was no difference of principle between His Majesty's Government and the Colonial Government; that the only question was whether His Majesty's Government had power by Order in Council to carry out in this respect the suspended Act of 1906.

That the difficulty with which His Majesty's Government were confronted was connected with the administration of certain other Colonial laws and regulations having the force of law, viz., the Act No. 19 of 1899, relating to light dues; the Act No. 13 of 1898, relating to customs; and the Colonial Fishery Regulations, made under the Act No. 3 of 1898. That His Majesty's Government have contended that these Acts and Regulations were binding upon United States' fishermen; that the United States' Government took the contrary view. That the proposed modus vivendi would probably involve some relaxation of these Acts and Regulations in favour of the United States' fishermen, but that to any such relaxation the Government of Newfoundland were at present strongly opposed, except as regards the liability to the payment of light dues, which they were prepared to waive.

That it was presumed that, if His Majesty's advisers, as responsible for the carrying out of His Majesty's Treaty obligations, were satisfied that the application of any of these Acts and Regulations to the United States' fishermen and their vessels was contrary to the true intent of the Convention, it would be possible and lawful for His Majesty by Order in Council to direct that any such Acts and Regulations should not be so applied, and to enforce any such direction through the naval officers on the coast, and that the validity of any such Order in Council or of any action taken under it could not be impugned on the ground that His Majesty's Government had placed an incorrect interpretation on the terms of the Convention.

That the point on which your Lordship felt some doubt was this: whether His Majesty's Government could properly pass an Order in Council to secure the provisional relaxation in favour of United States' fishermen of laws and regulations which they have contended, and, as at present advised, propose still to contend, were binding on them under the Convention.

That the matter was urgent. That your Lordship would therefore be obliged if we would take his letter into our early consideration, and favour you as soon as possible with our report on the following points, viz.:-

1. Whether His Majesty in Council had power under the Act 59 Geo. III, cap. 38, to order that the first part of section 1, and the whole of section 3, of "The Newfoundland Foreign Fishing-Vessels Act, 1905," should not apply or be applied to vessels from which inhabitants of the United States were exercising the liberty of fishing assured to them by the 1st Article of the Convention of the 20th October, 1818?

2. Whether His Majesty in Council had power under the same Act to direct that any other laws or regulations of the Colony, the enforcement of which on inhabitants of the United States exercising the Treaty right of fishery or on the vessels from which they were exercising it would, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, be contrary to the Convention, should not be so enforced?

3. Whether the words in the same Act "such regulations, &c., as shall or may be from time to time deemed proper and necessary for the carrying into effect the purposes of the said Convention" conferred on His Majesty's Government an absolute discretion, the exercise of which could not be questioned before a Court of Law on the ground that diplomatically His Majesty's Government were upholding a different construction of the Convention?

4. That if this were not the case, or it were doubtful whether it could successfully be maintained before a Court of Law, an Order in Council directing compliance with the terms of a modus vivendi, designed to facilitate the settlement of the question what were the real purposes of the Convention, was one which carried into effect purposes of the Convention and was therefore valid and enforceable?

5. What generally were the limitations, if any, on the exercise of the powers conferred on His Majesty in Council by the first section of the Act 59 George III, cap. 38?

We have taken the matter into our consideration, and, in obedience to your Lordship's commands, have the honour to

Report—

That, in our opinion, although "The Newfoundland Foreign Fishing-Vessels Act, 1905," may be disallowed by His Majesty in Council, or (so far as sections 1 and 3 are concerned) may be treated by the Courts as repugnant to 59 George III, cap. 38, and therefore void, under the Colonial Laws Validity Act (28 & 29 Vict., cap. 63, sec. 2), yet, while that Colonial Act stands duly allowed by His Majesty, it would not be in accordance with constitutional principle or practice for His Majesty in Council to order that the operation of particular sections should be suspended, either wholly or for such period as His Majesty in Council may be pleased to fix.

The Colonial Act in question is, however, incompetent to affect, and indeed does not assume to affect, the powers of His Majesty in Council under 59 George III, cap. 38, to make such regulations and give such orders, directions, and instructions as may be deemed proper and necessary under existing circumstances for carrying the Convention of 1818 into effect, and if such orders or instructions are inconsistent with sections 1 and 3 of the Colonial Act, the latter will be overruled in effect so far as American fishery rights are concerned.

2. We think that the powers of His Majesty in Council under 59 Geo. III, cap. 38, should be exercised strictly in the form permitted by the terms of the Act, viz., as regulations and instructions, and not as a revocation or suspension of Colonial legislative measures which have received the assent of His Majesty. All Colonial laws or regulations inconsistent with such regulations and instructions will be thereby rendered invalid.

3. The discretion conferred on His Majesty in Council under 59 Geo. III, cap. 38, is absolute, and the orders made in the exercise of that discretion could not be properly questioned in a Court of Law, except on the ground, not likely to be affirmed, that they were not in truth deemed by the Government to be proper and necessary for the purposes of the Convention. The mere fact that, in controversy with the United States, His Majesty's Government are contending for a construction of the Convention which would entitle them to subject the American fishermen to particular restrictions or interruptions does not compel them to impose such restrictions nor prevent them from issuing an Order inconsistent with them if they deem it proper and necessary with the object of maintaining the Convention under all the circumstances to do so, especially where the Order is temporary, and for the purpose only of a modus vivendi, until different regulations can be agreed.

4. The fact that the terms of a modus vivendi were designed to facilitate the discussion or settlement of some dispute which has arisen on the construction of the Convention would, in our opinion, be held by a Court to establish that such terms were "deemed proper and necessary" for carrying the Convention into effect, provided, of course, that they were such regulations as could be made under the Statute 59 Geo. III, cap. 38. If the modus vivendi were framed so as to be a formal and express suspension of subsisting Colonial legislation by the exercise of His Majesty's prerogative, the Order in Council would be objectionable on grounds independent altogether of the Statute in question.

5. We are not aware of any limitations on the exercise of the powers conferred on His Majesty in Council by section 1 of 59 Geo. III, cap. 38, other than such as appear from the limited purpose of the Statute and the general authority of the Imperial Legislature.

Law Officers of the Crown to Colonial Office.

My Lord,

Law Officers' Department, November 30, 1906.^cIs modus vivendi with United States a Treaty? Opinion of Messrs. Cohen and Coles as to its effect on Statutes.

WE were honoured by your Lordship's commands, signified to us by Mr. Bertram Cox in his letter of the 10th instant, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us the copy of a telegram from the Governor of Newfoundland, communicating the case submitted to Messrs. Cohen and Coles as to the effect of the modus vivendi which His Majesty's Government have concluded with the United States' Government on the fisheries question on certain Colonial Statutes, and the opinion given by those gentlemen on the subject.

That he was also to forward copy of the correspondence between His Majesty's Government and the United States' Government, in which the modus vivendi was embodied.

That the opinion of Messrs. Cohen and Coles appeared to be in effect that the modus vivendi was a Treaty, but that the Colonial Statutes to which their attention was called saved only rights and privileges granted by Treaty at the time they were passed.

That, as to whether the modus vivendi was a Treaty, he was to observe that in the case Baird v. Walker (A.C. 1892, pp. 491-497) the modus vivendi made with France in 1890 over the lobster fishery question was discussed on the footing of its being a Treaty.

That a copy of the modus vivendi of 1890 was also inclosed.

That it should, however, be pointed out that the Treaty-making power of the President of the United States of America was subject to the approval of the Senate. That it might, therefore, be contended that the present modus vivendi not having been so approved did not constitute a Treaty. That, on the other hand, it was possible that strictly the modus vivendi of 1890 required ratification by the French Parliament.

That of the various Colonial Statutes referred to in the case submitted by the Colonial Government, it would be seen that the Bait Act mentioned was that of 1887, not that of 1889, now Chapter 129 of Revised Statutes of Newfoundland. That possibly the reason why the attention of Messrs. Cohen and Coles was directed to the earlier Bait Act was because it was specially confirmed, ratified, and finally enacted "by an Order of Her late Majesty in Council."

That sections in these Acts which safeguard Treaty rights ran as follows:—

(A.) Bait Act of 1887:—

"Nothing in this Act shall affect the rights and privileges granted by Treaty to the subjects of any State in amity with Her Majesty."

(That the same words appeared in Chapter 129 of the Revised Statutes with the substitution of "Chapter" for "Act.")

(B.) The Marine and Fisheries Act of 1898, 61 Vic., cap. 3:—

"Nothing in this Act or in any Rules or Regulations to be made hereunder shall be construed to affect the rights and privileges granted by Treaty to the subjects of any State or Power in amity with Her Majesty."

(C.) The Foreign Fishing Vessels Act, 1905:—

"Nothing in this Act shall affect the rights and privileges granted by Treaty to the subjects of any State in amity with His Majesty."

That with reference to the construction which Messrs. Cohen and Coles have put upon these provisions, he was to point out that Section 6 of Chapter I of the Consolidated Statutes of Newfoundland (Second Series), 1892, provided: "In the construction of Acts the following Rules shall be observed, unless otherwise expressly provided for, or such construction would be inconsistent with the manifest intention of the Legislature or repugnant to the context—that is to say, the words 'Queen' or 'Her Majesty' shall include 'Her Majesty, her heirs and successors.'"

That he was also to call attention to the general rule, discussed in R. v. Smith, L.R.I.C.C. 270, that the language of a Statute was extended to new things of the same genus which were not known and could not have been contemplated by the Legislature when it was passed.

That he was to request that we would take his letter and its inclosures into our consideration, and favour your Lordship with our opinion on the following questions:—

(1.) Was the modus vivendi recently concluded with the United States' Government a Treaty?

(2.) Did the various sections in the Colonial Acts referred to, which safeguard rights and privileges granted by Treaty, apply to any rights and privileges granted to inhabitants of the United States by that modus vivendi, or only to rights under Treaties in existence when the Acts were passed?

We have taken the matter into our consideration, and, in obedience to your Lordship's commands, have the honour to

Report—

(1.) That in our opinion the modus vivendi recently concluded with the United States' Government is a Treaty within the meaning of the sections of the Colonial Acts referred to.

(2.) Assuming that the modus vivendi grants rights and privileges to the inhabitants of the United States, in excess of those granted by the Convention of 1818, the question involved—viz., the extent of the application of the clauses contained in the Colonial Acts safeguarding rights granted by Treaty—is one of considerable difficulty. If the object were to protect rights which had already been created by Treaties then existing, most appropriate words are used for that purpose; but if, on the other hand, it was intended to declare that the Treaty-making prerogative of the Crown should continue unfettered, even to the extent of creating new rights which might be inconsistent with the Acts, the words used are, if not wholly inappropriate, at least singularly inapt. The words of the clauses would undoubtedly be satisfied by a construction which limited their application to the Treaty of 1818, or any other Treaties concluded before the passing of the Acts. On the other hand, the extended construction suggested would involve a right upon the part of the Crown to entirely abrogate, in so far as foreigners were concerned, Acts to which the King had given his assent, and the Courts would, in the absence of the clearest words, shrink from adopting such a construction.

Having regard to the foregoing observations, although the point involved is not free from doubt, we are of opinion that the clauses referred to only apply to rights under Treaties in existence when the Acts in question were passed.

We have, &c.

My Lord,

Royal Courts of Justice, December 28, 1906.

WE were honoured by your Lordship's commands, signified to us by Mr. Bertram Cox in his letter of the 22nd November last, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to lay before us a copy of a Convention concluded with the United States of America on the 8th November, 1902, respecting commercial relations between that country and Newfoundland, and commonly known as the Hay-Bond Convention.

That, owing to the failure of the United States to approve this Convention, it had not yet been ratified either by the King or by the President of the United States. That the action of the Senate, as we were aware, had led to the withdrawal from United States' citizens of the privileges of purchasing bait, engaging crews, &c., in Newfoundland waters, and, consequently, to the present fisheries dispute.

That your Lordship understood that the Government of Newfoundland were still anxious for the ratification of the Convention. That you would, therefore, be obliged if we would favour your Lordship with our opinion on a question which had not hitherto been officially discussed, viz., whether, having regard to the terms on the one hand of Article I of the Convention, and, on the other, of section 3 of the Imperial Act 59, Geo. III, cap. 38, an Act of the Imperial Parliament was not in strictness required to carry the Convention into effect, and, if so, whether it would be proper, unless and until such an Act was passed, to advise His Majesty to ratify the Convention, seeing that Article VI merely provided that the provisions of the Convention should go into effect thirty days after the exchange of ratifications.

That the printed Memorandum forwarded to us in the letter from your Department of the 10th instant contained some observations on the subject of your present letter.

We have taken the matter into our consideration, and, in obedience to your Lordship's commands, have the honour to

Report—

That, in our opinion, an Act of Parliament is necessary to carry the Convention into effect, and that it would not be proper to advise His Majesty to ratify the Convention unless provision is made for such an Act being passed.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, November 14, 1905

Seizure of
"Agnes G.
Donahoe" and trial of crew.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list relative to the seizure and detention by the Uruguayan authorities of the Canadian schooner "Agnes G. Donahoe" on a charge of illegal sealing.

The facts of the case and the correspondence which has passed respecting the action of the Uruguayan Courts are recorded in detail in the accompanying historical Memorandum (Paper (A)).

The salient points may be summarized as follows:—

The vessel, under the command of Mr. Ryan, a British subject, of North Sydney, Cape Breton, and with a crew of eighteen, of whom all but one were British subjects, was seized on the 11th November, 1904, some three-quarters of a mile from shore and taken at once to Monte Video, where the captain was charged with illegal sealing, robbery, and smuggling.

The legal proceedings began with an investigation by the Juge d'Instruction, which lasted from the 12th November, 1904, to the 14th February, 1905.

It then became necessary, as the next step, for the "Fiscal," or Public Prosecutor, to draw up his "Acte d'Accusation" (Paper (B)), for which purpose the law allowed six days.

The "Fiscal," however, took six weeks, so that the counsel for the defence could only begin to prepare his reply on the 24th March.

That reply (Paper (C)) was put in without loss of time, but the Judge of the Correctional Court took six weeks to consider the case thus put before him, and it was not till the 16th May that judgment was eventually delivered.

By this judgment, which is textually recorded in Mr. Baring's despatches Nos. 42 and 52 of the 23rd May and the 21st June (Papers (D) and (E)), the master of the "Agnes G. Donahoe" was sentenced to three years' penal servitude on a charge of robbery and the mates to one year's imprisonment. The detention which they had already undergone was held to be sufficient punishment for the crew, but the cargo and ship were condemned to remain under embargo to meet the costs and any claims which might arise.

The proceedings throughout had been characterized by the grossest dilatoriness on the part of the Uruguayan authorities, and the numerous remonstrances against the delay of the Court in delivering that judgment which Mr. Baring was obliged from time to time to address to the Uruguayan Government, were consistently met by a failure to expedite the case and so relieve the anxiety and sufferings of the master, who continued in confinement on board his vessel.

An appeal to the Criminal Court against the sentence was immediately presented by the counsel for the defence. The translation of this appeal, which is technically known as the "Expresión de Agravios," will be found (marked Paper (F)) in the accompanying list.

While the outrageous character of the sentence was recognized, and though grave doubt was entertained as to whether a judgment condemning irregular sealing operations as acts of robbery could be justified by Uruguayan or any other known legal system, it was felt that the appeal to the higher Tribunal must be allowed to run its course, and that the moment at which His Majesty's Government would be entitled to interfere would, strictly speaking, only arrive when the Court of Appeal affirmed, if it did affirm, the conviction.

In order the better to secure justice at the final hearing, His Majesty's Government accepted an offer made by the Government of Canada to send Mr. Pelton, a Canadian lawyer, to assist His Majesty's Representative at Monte Video and the counsel for the defence in their efforts to obtain justice.

A further delay now occurred similar to that which had characterized the earlier proceedings before the Correctional Court, and, in spite of the repeated requests of Mr. Baring that the case should be expedited, and of the strong personal remonstrances which were addressed to the Uruguayan Chargé d'Affaires in London—as shown in the accompanying Memorandum—systematic, and apparently deliberate, obstruction was placed in the way of a finding by the higher Tribunal.

It was not till the 11th August that judgment was ultimately delivered (Paper (G)). The captain was condemned to ten months' imprisonment on the charge of smuggling, to date from the 11th November, 1904, the day of his arrest. The charge of theft was held not to be in accordance with Uruguayan law, and to be unfounded. The vessel and cargo were confiscated. The mates, although condemned as accomplices, were released without further imprisonment.

His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires was requested on the following day to take steps to obtain the master's release, on the ground of legal doubt or on the plea of health, but so much delay was again made by the Uruguayan Government in dealing with this application that the period of ten months' imprisonment practically expired before any result was obtained. On the 10th September the master was released in due course, and the Courts ordered the schooner to be handed over to him, but retained the skins and guns on board pending further decision.

Since that date appeals have been received from the first and second mates (Paper (H)), and from the master (Paper (I)), claiming compensation from the Uruguayan Government for illegal detention.

A Memorandum (Paper (J)) has been drawn up by Mr. Pelton and Dr. Wilson, the counsel for the defence, containing their views on the judgment, in which they maintain that Mr. Ryan, the master of the schooner, should not have been convicted of the offence of smuggling, for the three following reasons:—

1. That there is no evidence whatever to sustain the judgment.
2. That such judgment is not warranted by any law of Uruguay. Article 1125 of the Commercial Code of Uruguay provides that all fines imposed for infringement of Police and Custom-house Regulations, &c., must be borne by the master of the ship, and not by the owners; and Article 152 of the Criminal Code of Uruguay provides for sequestration, &c., of the property of the accused, not of third persons.
3. That the Criminal Judge had no jurisdiction to try the offence of smuggling or to adjudicate in any way upon such a charge, either with respect to person or property.

By the Law of Uruguay of March 1877, a special Court is established, with sole jurisdiction to try and determine charges of smuggling, and it is held to follow, as a result of this enactment, that no other Court in the Republic has the right to assume the jurisdiction of this special Court, or to deal with that class of offences.

The expediency of an immediate appeal in regard to the sentence passed on Mr. Ryan was also considered by Mr. Pelton and Dr. Wilson, as recorded at the end of their Memorandum. They held, however, that, as the judgment decided that only the

It is suggested, for consideration, that to ignore the existence of a higher Tribunal by immediately presenting a claim diplomatically will be equivalent to a general condemnation of the Uruguayan judicial system, whereas an allegation that the conviction is unsound in point of law will doubtless call forth a retort from the Uruguayan Government that the proper Tribunal before which to urge this argument is the Court of Appeal.

URUGUAY.—ZANZIBAR.

Report.

We have carefully considered the facts of this case, and are, on the whole, of opinion that it is desirable to prosecute appeals before the Uruguayan Courts on behalf of the master and the owners of the cargo before presenting any claim for compensation through diplomatic channels. No judgment on appeal can now give the master adequate redress, as he has already suffered the penalty of a long imprisonment, but it may possibly reverse, or will at least more clearly define, the grounds of judgment. This will simplify the controversy which will arise on the diplomatic claim, and preclude the Uruguayan Government from saying that His Majesty's Government have not adopted the usual course of exhausting all the means of local redress before having recourse to diplomatic measures.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you herewith the accompanying draft of an Order in Council for Zanzibar.

This draft Order is designed to replace the Zanzibar Order in Council, 1897, and the amending Orders of 1903 and 1904, copies of which accompany the papers, and has been prepared with a view to meeting the situation at Zanzibar created by the closing of the extra-territorial Courts of foreign Powers other than Great Britain, the Protecting Power.

An explanatory Memorandum is also inclosed.

Sir E. Grey will be glad if you will take the draft Order into your consideration, and will favour him with your opinion as to whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

I have, &c.

PART II.—APPLICATION AND EFFECT OF ORDER.

6.—(1.) This Order extends to British subjects, to British protected persons, to foreigners with respect to whom the Sultan of Zanzibar has decreed or the Sovereign or Government whose subjects or citizens they are, or under whose protection they are or are claimed as being, has, by Treaty or otherwise, agreed with His Majesty for, or consented to the exercise of jurisdiction by His Majesty and to Zanzibar subjects in the regular service of such foreigners; and the expression "persons subject to this Order" shall be construed accordingly.

(3.) This Order also extends, in the cases and according to the conditions specified in this Order, to Zanzibar subjects and to foreigners not otherwise subject to this Order.

7. If any question arises whether the Sovereign or Government of any country has agreed with His Majesty for or consented to the exercise of jurisdiction by His Majesty over all or any of his or their subjects or citizens, or over persons under or claimed as being under his or their protection, it shall be referred to the Secretary of State, and a certificate under his hand and seal shall be conclusive on the question, and judicial notice shall be taken thereof.

Provided that nothing herein shall be held to abridge or take away the jurisdiction of the Court to determine whether any particular individual is or is not a subject or citizen of such Sovereign or Government, or under or claimed as being under his or their protection.

PART III.—CONSTITUTION OF COURTS.

8.—(1.) There shall be a Court styled "His Britannic Majesty's Court for Zanzibar," hereinafter referred to also as "the Court for Zanzibar" and "the Court."

(2.) Subject to the other provisions of this Order, all His Majesty's jurisdiction in Zanzibar for the hearing and determination of suits shall be, and is hereby, vested in the Court for Zanzibar.

(3.) There shall be a Judge, and as many Assistant Judges of the Court as may from time to time be required, who shall respectively be appointed by His Majesty by warrant under His Royal sign manual.

(4.) The Judge and the Assistant Judges shall hold office during the pleasure of His Majesty.

(5.) A person appointed to be Judge or Assistant Judge must be a member of the Bar of England, Scotland, or Ireland, and must be of not less than five years' standing on appointment as Judge, and of not less than four years' standing on appointment as Assistant Judge.

(6.) The Court shall also comprise a Magistrate, who shall be appointed by the Secretary of State. The Magistrate shall be a member of the bar of England, Scotland, or Ireland of not less than three years' standing at the date of his appointment, and shall hold office during pleasure.

(7.) Subject to any Rules of Court, the Judge shall make any such arrangements as he thinks fit for the distribution of the business of the Court.

9. During a vacancy in the office of Judge, or in case of the illness or incapacity of the Judge, or of his absence from Zanzibar, the Secretary of State may appoint a fit person to act as Judge, but unless or until such appointment is made, the Assistant Judge or Senior Assistant Judge shall act as Judge.

An Acting Judge shall, during the continuance of his appointment, have all the power and authority of the Judge.

10. During a vacancy or temporary vacancy in the office of Assistant Judge, or in case of the absence, or illness, or other incapacity of an Assistant Judge, the Judge may, by writing under his hand and the seal of the Court, appoint any fit person, approved by the Secretary of State, or by the British Agent, to act as an Assistant Judge for the time therein mentioned or during the vacancy, as the case may be; but every such appointment shall be revocable, at pleasure, by the Judge, by writing under his hand and the seal of the Court, or by the Secretary of State.

The person so appointed shall, during the continuance of his appointment, have all the power and authority of an Assistant Judge.

11. The Court shall have a seal bearing the style of the Court, and a device approved by the Secretary of State; but the seal in use at the commencement of this Order shall continue to be used until a new seal is provided.

12. Subject to the directions of the Secretary of State, the Judge may appoint such and so many persons to be Registrars, Clerks, Bailiffs, Interpreters, and other officers of the Court as he thinks fit, and may remove from office any person so appointed.

Any Registrar of the Court, and any other officer of the Court designated in this behalf by the Judge, may administer oaths, and take affidavits, declarations, and affirmations.

13.—(1.) The Secretary of State may, if he thinks fit, appoint subordinate Courts to be held at places in Zanzibar, and may appoint a competent person to hold any such Court, under such designation, and with such remuneration as he may direct, and may assign to any such Court such jurisdiction as he may think fit, and may assign the district in and for which each such Court shall act, and may determine the description and number of the officers to be attached to any such Court and the mode of their appointment and removal, and their duties and remuneration, and any matters incident to any of the above-mentioned purposes.

(2.) Any person appointed under the provisions of this Article shall be removable by authority of the Secretary of State.

(3.) The Court for Zanzibar shall have within the district of any such subordinate Court an original jurisdiction concurrent with the jurisdiction thereof, and shall also have such appellate jurisdiction therefrom as may be assigned to it in the order of the Secretary of State.

(4.) During the absence, illness, or other incapacity of a person appointed by the Secretary of State to hold a subordinate Court the Judge may, by writing under his hand and the seal of the Court, appoint any fit person approved by the British Agent as a substitute; but every such appointment shall be revocable at pleasure by the Judge by writing under his hand and the seal of the Court or by the Secretary of State.

PART IV.—APPLICATION OF THE DECREES OF THE SULTAN OF ZANZIBAR.

14. Subject to the other provisions of this Order, and to any Treaties for the time being in force relating to Zanzibar, the Court shall apply to all persons subject to this Order the Decrees of the Sultan of Zanzibar, provided that they have been countersigned by the British Agent.

15. The enactments described in the First Schedule to "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," shall apply to Zanzibar as if Zanzibar were a British Colony or possession, but subject to the provisions of this Order and to the exceptions, adaptations, and modifications following, that is to say:—

(i.) The British Agent is hereby substituted for the Governor of a Colony or British possession, and the Court for Zanzibar is hereby substituted for a Superior Court or Supreme Court and for a Magistrate or Justice of the Peace of a Colony or British possession.

(ii.) For the portions of the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1854 and 1867, referred to in the said Schedule, shall be substituted Part XIII of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894."

(iii.) In section 51 of "The Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874," and any enactment for the time being in force amending the same, the Court for Zanzibar is substituted for a Court of Probate in a Colony.

(iv.) With respect to "The Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881,"—

(a.) So much of the 4th and 5th sections of the said Act as relates to sending a report of the issue of a warrant, together with the information, or a copy thereof, or to the sending of a certificate of committal and report of a case, or to the information to be given by a Magistrate to a fugitive, shall be excepted, and in lieu of such information, the person acting as the Magistrate shall inform the fugitive that in the British possession or Protectorate to which he may be conveyed he has the right to apply for a writ of habeas corpus or other like process.

(b.) So much of the 6th section of the said Act as requires the expiration of fifteen days before issue of a warrant shall be excepted.

(c.) The British Agent shall not be bound to return a fugitive offender to a British possession unless satisfied that the proceedings to obtain his return are taken with the consent of the Governor of that possession.

(d.) For the purposes of Part II of the said Act, Zanzibar, the East Africa and Uganda Protectorates, British India, Aden, Mauritius, and all British possessions and Protectorates in Africa south of the Equator shall be deemed to be one group of British possessions.

PART V.—CRIMINAL MATTERS.

16.—(1.) The Court for Zanzibar shall have full criminal jurisdiction over all persons subject to this Order.

(2.) The Court shall exercise criminal jurisdiction over Zanzibar subjects accused of committing an offence against any person subject to this Order, and in such cases there shall be no appeal to the High Court of Bombay.

(3.) The Court shall have such appellate jurisdiction from the Criminal Courts of the Sultan of Zanzibar as may be assigned to it by Decree of the Sultan countersigned by the British Agent.

(4.) The Magistrate shall exercise such jurisdiction over natives of Africa who are subject to this Order, and subject to such rights of appeal to or revision or confirmation by the Judge or one or more of the Assistant Judges of the Court, as may from time to time be conferred upon him by Decree of the Sultan, countersigned by the British Agent.

17. Where a person subject to this Order is accused of an offence the cognizance whereof appertains to the Court for Zanzibar, and it is expedient that the offence be inquired of, tried, determined and punished in a British possession, the accused may, under "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," section 6, be sent for trial to Bombay.

The Court may, where it appears so expedient, by warrant under the hand of a Judge and the seal of the Court, cause the accused to be sent for trial to Bombay accordingly.

The warrant shall be sufficient authority to any person to whom it is directed to receive and detain the person therein named, and to carry him to and deliver him up at Bombay according to the warrant.

Where any person is to be so sent to Bombay, the Court before which he is accused shall take the preliminary examination, and, if it seems necessary and proper, shall bind over such of the proper witnesses as are persons subject to this Order in their own recognizances to appear and give evidence on the trial.

18.—(1.) If a person subject to this Order, having appeared as prosecutor or witness at a preliminary examination, refuses to enter into a recognizance to appear at the trial to prosecute or give evidence, the Court may send him to prison, there to remain until after the trial, unless in the meantime he enters into a recognizance.

(2.) But if afterwards, from want of sufficient evidence or other cause, the accused is discharged, the Court shall order that the person imprisoned for so refusing be also discharged.

19.—(1.) In cases of murder or culpable homicide, if either the death or the criminal act which wholly or partly caused the death happened in Zanzibar, a Court acting under this Order shall have the like jurisdiction over any person subject to this Order who is charged either as a principal offender or as an abettor, as if both the criminal act and the death had happened in Zanzibar.

(2.) In the case of any offence committed on the high seas, or within the Admiralty jurisdiction, by any person subject to this Order, who at the time of committing such offence was on board a British ship, or on board a foreign ship to which he did not belong, a Court acting under this Order shall have jurisdiction as if the offence had been committed within Zanzibar.

(3.) In cases tried under this Article no different sentence can be passed from the sentence which could be passed in England if the offence were tried there.

20. The Court may, if it thinks fit, by general order, prescribe the manner in which and the places in Zanzibar at which sentences of imprisonment are to be carried into execution.

21.—(1.) Where an offender convicted before the Court is sentenced to imprisonment, and the Court, proceeding under section 7 of "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," authority in that behalf being hereby given to it, considers it expedient that the sentence should be carried into effect within His Majesty's dominions, the place shall be a place in some part of His Majesty's dominions out of the United Kingdom the Government whereof consents that offenders may be sent thither under this Article.

(2.) The Court may, by warrant under the hand of a Judge and the seal of the Court, cause the offender to be sent to Bombay, or other such place as aforesaid, in order that the sentence may be there carried into effect accordingly.

(3.) The warrant shall be sufficient authority to any person to whom it is directed to receive and detain the person therein named, and to carry him to and deliver him up at the place named, according to the warrant.

22.—(1.) Where it is proved that there is reasonable ground to apprehend that a person subject to this Order is about to commit a breach of the public peace—or that the acts or conduct of a person subject to this Order are, or is likely to produce or excite to, a breach of the public peace—the Court may, if it thinks fit, cause him to be brought before it, and require him to give security to the satisfaction of the Court, to keep the peace, or for his future good behaviour, as the case may require.

(2.) Where a person subject to this Order is convicted of an offence before the Court, the Court may, if it thinks fit, require him to give security to the satisfaction of the Court for his future good behaviour, and for that purpose may (if need be) cause him to be brought before the Court.

(3.) In either of the foregoing cases, if the person required to give security fails to do so, the Court may order that he be deported from Zanzibar to such place and for such period as the Court directs.

23. Where it is shown by evidence on oath, to the satisfaction of the British Agent, that any person subject to this Order is conducting himself so as to be dangerous to peace and good order in Zanzibar, or is endeavouring to excite enmity between the Sultan or people of Zanzibar and His Majesty, or is intriguing against His Majesty's power and authority in Zanzibar or against the authority of the Sultan of Zanzibar, the British Agent may, if he thinks fit, by Order order that person to be deported from the Protectorate to such place and for such period as he shall direct:

Provided that where such person is a foreigner no such order shall be made by the British Agent without the concurrence in writing of the Consul of the State to which such foreigner belongs.

24.—(1.) In any case of deportation under this Order, the place to which the person is ordered, to be deported shall be a place in some part (if any) of His Majesty's dominions to which the person belongs, or the Government of which consents to the reception of persons deported under this Order, or a place under the Protectorate of His Majesty, or in the country out of His Majesty's dominions to which the person belongs.

(2.) An appeal shall not lie against an order of deportation made under this Order.

(3.) The person to be deported shall be detained in custody until a fit opportunity for his deportation occurs.

(4.) He shall, as soon as is practicable, and in the case of a person convicted, either after execution of the sentence or while it is in course of execution, be embarked in custody under the warrant of the British Agent or of the Court on board one of His Majesty's vessels of war, or, if there is no such vessel available, then on board any British or other fit vessel bound to the place of deportation.

(5.) The warrant shall be sufficient authority to the commander or master of the vessel to receive and detain the person therein named, and to carry him to and deliver him up at the place named according to the warrant.

(6.) If any master of a British ship, after a reasonable remuneration for the conveyance of a deported person has been tendered or paid to him, refuses or fails to carry such person to the place named, he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 750 rupees.

(7.) The expenses of deportation shall be defrayed in such manner as the Secretary of State, with the concurrence of the Treasury, may direct: Provided that where an order of deportation is made by the Court, the Court may order the person to be deported to pay all or any part of the expenses of his deportation.

(8.) An order of deportation made, either by the British Agent or the Court, shall be reported to the Secretary of State forthwith, together with a statement of the grounds on which it has been made; and if made by the Court, shall be reported in like manner to the British Agent.

(9.) If any person deported under this or any former Order returns to Zanzibar without permission in writing of the Secretary of State (which permission the Secretary of State may give), he shall be guilty of an offence against this Order, punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two months, or with fine which may extend to 1,000 rupees, or to both; and he shall also be liable to be forthwith again deported.

25. Any person convicted of an offence against any Decree, Law, Order, or Regulation in force in Zanzibar, for the breach of which no penalty is provided, he shall be liable to imprisonment for a period not exceeding six months, or to a fine not exceeding 500 rupees, or to both.

26. When a warrant or order of arrest is issued by a competent judicial authority in the East Africa Protectorate or in the Uganda Protectorate for the apprehension of a person who is accused of crime committed in that Protectorate, and who is, or is supposed to be, within Zanzibar, and that warrant or order is produced to any Court acting under this Order, the Court may back the warrant or order, and the same, when so backed, shall be sufficient authority to any person to whom it was originally directed, and also to any constable or officer of the Court by whom it is backed, and to any person named on the back of the warrant or order, to apprehend the accused person at any place within the limits of this Order and to carry him to and deliver him up within the jurisdiction of the authority issuing the warrant or order.

PART VI.—CIVIL MATTERS.

27. The Court for Zanzibar shall have full civil jurisdiction over all persons subject to this Order.

28.—(1.) The Court for Zanzibar shall hear and determine all civil questions, claims, or disputes arising between any Zanzibar subject and any person subject to this Order, whether the former is either plaintiff or defendant.

(2.) The High Court of Bombay shall not exercise jurisdiction in any such suit.

29.—(1.) The Court shall have Admiralty jurisdiction within the limits of this Order, and over vessels and persons coming within the same.

(2.) The following enactments of "The Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890," that is to say, section 2, sub-sections (2) to (4); sections 5 and 6; section 16, sub-section (3); shall apply to the Court as if that Court were a Colonial Court of Admiralty, and as if Zanzibar were a British possession; and for the purpose of this application the expressions "judgment" and "appeal" shall in the enactments so applied have the same respective meanings as are assigned thereto in section 15 of the said Act.

(3.) The duties of the Admiralty Registrar shall, until the Judge with the approval of the Secretary of State shall otherwise order, be performed by an Assistant Judge.

30.—(1.) The Court shall endeavour to obtain, as early as may be, notice of the death of every person subject to this Order dying and leaving property to be administered, and all such information as may serve to guide the Court with respect to the securing and administration of his property.

(2.) On receiving notice of the death of such a person, the Court shall put up a Notice thereof at the Court-house, and shall keep the same there until probate or administration is granted, or, where it appears to the Court that probate or administration will not be applied for, or cannot be granted, for such time as the Court thinks fit.

(3.) The Court shall, where the circumstances of the case appear so to require, as soon as may be, take possession of the property in Zanzibar of the deceased, or put it under the seal of the Court (in either case, if the nature of the property or other circumstances so require, making an inventory), and so keep it until it can be dealt with according to law.

(4.) All expenses incurred by the Court in so doing shall be the first charge on the property of the deceased, and the Court shall, by sale of the property or part thereof, or otherwise, provide for the discharge of these expenses.

31. When a person subject to this Order dies intestate, his property shall, until administration is granted, vest in the Judge.

32. If any person named executor in a will takes possession of, and administers or otherwise deals with, any part of the property of the deceased, and does not obtain probate within one month after the death, or after the termination of any proceeding respecting probate or administration, he shall be liable to pay double the amount of the fee chargeable on obtaining probate, and he shall also be liable to a fine not exceeding 1,000 rupees.

33. The production of a grant of probate or of letters of administration shall, in all cases, be necessary to establish the right to recover any part of the estate or effects of any deceased person, subject to this Order, situate in Zanzibar.

34. If any person other than the person named executor, or the administrator, or an officer of the Court, takes possession of and administers, or otherwise deals with, any part of the property of the deceased, he shall, as soon as practicable, notify the fact and the circumstances to the Court, and shall furnish to the Court all such information as the Court requires, and shall conform to any directions of the Court in relation to the custody, disposal, or transmission of the property, or the proceeds thereof, and, in case of any contravention of this Article, he shall be liable to pay double the amount of the fee chargeable on obtaining probate or letters of administration, and shall also be liable to a fine not exceeding 1,000 rupees.

35.—(1.) When the peculiar circumstances of the case appear to the Court so to require, for reasons recorded in its proceedings, the Court may, if it thinks fit, of its own motion, or otherwise, grant letters of administration to an officer or practitioner of the Court or to such other person as it may think fit.

(2.) The person so appointed shall act under the direction of the Court, and shall be indemnified thereby; and if he is a practitioner shall not act otherwise than as administrator in relation to the estate.

(3.) He shall publish such notices, if any, as the Court thinks fit, in Zanzibar or elsewhere.

(4.) The Court shall require and compel him to file, in the proper office of the Court, his accounts of his administration, at intervals, not exceeding three months.

(5.) The accounts shall be audited under the direction of the Court.

(6.) All expenses incurred in behalf of the Court in execution of this Article shall be the first charge on the estate of the deceased in Zanzibar; and the Court shall, by the sale of the estate, or otherwise, provide for the discharge of those expenses.

36. All real or immovable property situate in Zanzibar, and belonging at the time of his death to any person, subject to this Order, dying after the commencement of this Order, shall be deemed to be personal estate, and the devolution thereof, in case of intestacy, shall be regulated according to the law of the person's domicile for the time being relating to personal estate or movable property.

37.—(1.) Where a Court of Probate in the United Kingdom, or in any British possession to which "The Colonial Probates Act, 1892," for the time being extends, has granted probate or letters of administration or confirmation in respect of the estate of a deceased person, the probate letters or confirmation so granted may, on being produced to and a copy thereof deposited with the Court, be sealed with the seal of the Court, and thereupon shall be of the like force and effect, and have the same operation as if granted by the Court.

(2.) Provided that the Court shall, before sealing any probate letters or confirmation under this section, be satisfied either that all probate or estate duty has been paid in respect of so much of the estate situate in Zanzibar as is liable to such duty, or that security has been given in a sum sufficient to cover the property (if any) in Zanzibar, and may require such evidence (if any) as it thinks fit as to the domicile of the deceased person.

(3.) The Court may also, if it thinks fit, on the application of any creditor, require, before sealing, that adequate security be given for the payment of debts due from the estate to creditors residing in Zanzibar.

(4.) For the purposes of this Article, a duplicate of any probate letters of administration or confirmation, sealed with the seal of the Court granting the same, or a copy thereof certified as correct by or under the authority of the Court granting the same, shall have the same effect as the original.

38. Where it appears to the Court that the value of the property or estate of a deceased person does not exceed 50L., the Court may, notwithstanding anything contained in this Order, without any probate or letters of administration, or other formal proceeding, pay thereout any debts or charges, and pay, remit, or deliver any surplus to such persons, subject to such conditions (if any) as the Court thinks proper, and shall not be liable to any action, suit, or proceedings in respect of anything done under this Article. Every proceeding of the Court under this Article shall be recorded in the Minutes.

PART VII.—MISCELLANEOUS.

39.—(1.) Where it is proved that the attendance of any person subject to this Order to give evidence, or for any other purpose connected with the administration of justice, is required before a Court of the Sultan of Zanzibar, the Court for Zanzibar may, if it thinks fit, in a case and in circumstances in which the Court for Zanzibar would require the attendance of that person before the Court, order that he do attend as required. The order may be made subject to conditions as to payment or tender of expenses or otherwise.

(2.) If the person ordered to attend, having reasonable notice of the time and place at which he is required to attend, fails to attend accordingly, and does not excuse his failure to the satisfaction of the Court for Zanzibar, or if, when so attending to give evidence, he wilfully gives false evidence, or refuses to be sworn or to give evidence, he shall, independently of any other liability, be liable to be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two months, or with fine which may extend to 1,000 rupees, or with both.

40. If a person subject to this Order—

(1.) Wilfully obstructs, by act or threat, any Court of the Sultan of Zanzibar in the performance of its duty; or

(2.) Within or close to the room or place where such a Court is sitting, wilfully misbehaves in a violent, threatening, or disrespectful manner, to the disturbance of the Court or to the intimidation of suitors or others resorting to the Court; or

(3.) Wilfully insults any member or officer of such a Court in his going to, or returning from, any place of sitting or office of the Court;

He shall, on conviction before the Court for Zanzibar, be liable to be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two months, or with fine which may extend to 1,000 rupees, or with both.

41.—(1.) Every agreement for reference to arbitration between a person subject to this Order, on the one hand, and a person not subject to this Order, on the other hand, may, on the application of any party, be filed for execution in the proper office of the Court.

(2.) The Court shall thereupon have authority to enforce the agreement and the Award made thereunder, and to control and regulate the proceedings before and after the Award, in such manner and on such terms as the Court may think fit.

(3.) If a person subject to this Order wilfully gives false evidence in an arbitration, he shall, on conviction before the Court for Zanzibar, be liable to the same punishment as if he were convicted of giving false evidence in a proceeding in that Court.

42.—(1.) A non-testamentary instrument to which a person subject to this Order is a party, executed after the 28th day of November, 1893, and purporting to create, declare, assign, limit, or extinguish, whether in present or in future, any right, title, or interest, whether vested or contingent to, in, or over immovable property situate in Zanzibar, shall not affect any immovable property comprised therein, or be received as evidence of any transaction affecting that property, unless—

(a.) If the instrument was executed before the commencement of this Order, it has been registered at the registration office of the Zanzibar Government, or at His Majesty's Consulate, or at some other Consulate in accordance with the rules (if any) applicable to the registration of such instruments;

(b.) If the instrument was executed after the commencement of this Order, it has been registered in accordance with the Decrees of the Sultan of Zanzibar in force for the time being.

(2.) Provided that nothing in this Article shall make any instrument inadmissible in evidence in any criminal proceeding.

43.—(1.) Notwithstanding anything in this Order, the Court for Zanzibar shall not exercise any jurisdiction in any proceeding whatsoever over the British Agent, or his official or other residences, or his official or other property.

(2.) A person attached to or being a member of His Majesty's Agency and Consulate-General shall not, in giving evidence before the Court, be counselled or allowed to answer any question or produce any document if, in the opinion of the British Agent, signified by him personally or in writing to the Court, the answering or production thereof would be injurious to His Majesty's service.

44. The Judge may make Rules of Court—

(a.) For regulating the pleading, practice, and procedure in the Courts established under this Order with respect to all matters within the jurisdiction of the respective Courts;

(b.) For regulating the practice where any party wishes to appeal;

(c.) For regulating the means by which particular facts may be proved in the said Courts;

(d.) For prescribing any forms to be used;

(e.) For prescribing or regulating the duties of the officers of the said Courts;

(f.) For prescribing scales of costs and regulating any matters in connection therewith;

(g.) For prescribing and enforcing the fees to be taken in respect of any proceedings under this Order, not exceeding, as regards any matters provided for by "The Consular Salaries and Fees Act, 1891," fees fixed and allowed from time to time by any Order in Council made under that Act;

(h.) For prescribing the allowances to be made in criminal cases to complainants, witnesses, jurors, assessors, interpreters, medical practitioners, and other persons employed in the administration of justice, and the conditions upon which an order may be made by the Court for such allowances;

(i.) For taking and transmitting depositions of witnesses for use at trials in a British possession or in the United Kingdom;

(k.) For regulating the mode in which legal practitioners are to be admitted to practice as such, and for withdrawing or suspending the right to practice on grounds of misconduct, subject to a right of appeal to the High Court at Bombay.

Where under any Act of Parliament which is applicable to Zanzibar Rules may or are required to be made in England by the Lord Chancellor or any Judicial authority, the powers of this Article shall include a power to make such Rules for the purposes of that Act so far as applicable.

Rules framed under this Article shall not have effect until approved by the Secretary of State, and, so far as they relate to fees and costs, sanctioned by the Treasury; but in case of urgency declared in any such Rules with the approval of the British Agent, the same shall have effect unless and until they are disapproved by the Secretary of State, and notification of such disapproval is recorded and published by the Judge.

Until such Rules have been made, or in relation to matters to which they do not extend, the Court may follow and employ any Rules, practice, or forms heretofore in use in the Court and in force immediately before the commencement of this Order, with any modifications or adaptations which may be necessary.

45. The Court may, in any case, if it thinks fit, on account of the poverty of a party, or for any other reason, to be recorded in the Minutes, dispense with or remit the payment of any fee in whole or in part.

46.—(1.) Payment of fees payable under any Rules to be made in pursuance of this Order, and of costs and of charges and expenses of witnesses, prosecutions, punishments, and deportations and of other charges and expenses, and of fines respectively payable under this Order, may be enforced under order of the Court by seizure and sale of goods, and, in default of sufficient goods, by imprisonment as a civil prisoner for a term not exceeding one month, but such imprisonment shall not operate as a satisfaction or extinguishment of the liability.

(2.) Any bill of sale or mortgage, or transfer of property made with a view of avoiding seizure or sale of goods or ship under any provision of this Order, shall not be effectual to defeat the provisions of this Order.

47.—(1.) The British Agent may countersign any Decrees made by the Sultan of Zanzibar in the exercise of his authority over his dominions, and such Decrees shall thereupon become binding on all persons subject to this Order.

(2.) The British Agent shall observe any general or special instructions of the Secretary of State with reference to the submission of any Decrees issued or proposed to be issued by the Sultan to the Secretary of State before so countersigning them; but nothing in this provision shall affect the validity of a Decree when countersigned by the British Agent.

(3.) The British Agent shall, at the first available opportunity, transmit to the Secretary of State an authenticated copy of any Decree of the Sultan countersigned by him.

(4.) The British Agent may at any time publish a notice that his counter-signature to any Decree published by the Sultan is revoked, and such Decree shall then cease to be binding on all persons subject to this Order accordingly.

48. Subject to the other provisions of this Order, all expenses of removal of prisoners and others, and the expenses of deportation and of the sending of any person to Bombay, or to any part of His Majesty's dominions or Protectorates, including expenses of maintenance, shall be defrayed in such manner as the Secretary of State, with the concurrence of the Treasury, directs.

49.—(1.) If an officer of the Court employed to execute an order loses, by neglect or omission, the opportunity of executing it, then, on complaint of the person aggrieved and proof of the fact alleged, the Court may, if it thinks fit, order the officer to pay the damages sustained by the person complaining, or part thereof.

(2.) The order may be enforced as an order directing payment of money.

50.—(1.) If a clerk or officer of the Court, acting under pretence of the process of authority of the Court, is charged with extortion, or with not paying over money duly levied, or with other misconduct, the Court may, if it thinks fit, inquire into the charge in a summary way, and may for that purpose summon and enforce the attendance of all necessary persons as in an action, and may make such order for the repayment of any money extorted, or for the payment over of any money levied, and for the payment of such damages and costs, as the Court thinks fit.

(2.) The Court may also, if it thinks fit, on the same inquiry, impose on the clerk or officer a fine not exceeding 50 rupees for each offence.

(3.) A clerk or officer punished under this Article shall not, without the leave of the Court, be liable to an action in respect of the same matter; and any such action, if already or afterwards begun, may be stayed by the Court in such manner and on such terms as the Court thinks fit.

(4.) Nothing in this Article shall be deemed to prevent any person from being prosecuted under any other law for any act or omission punishable under this Article, or from being liable under that other law to any higher punishment or penalty than that provided by this Article. Provided that no person shall be punished twice for the same offence.

51. Not later than the 31st March in each year the Judge shall send to the Secretary of State a Report on the operation of this Order up to the 31st December in the previous year showing, for the then last twelve months, the number and nature of the proceedings, criminal or civil, taken under this Order, and the result thereof, and the number and amount of fees received, and such other information, and being in such form as the Secretary of State from time to time directs.

PART VIII.—REPEAL AND TRANSITORY PROVISIONS.

52. On the commencement of this Order, the following Orders in Council shall be repealed, that is to say:—

- "The Zanzibar Order in Council, 1897."
- "The Zanzibar Order in Council, 1903."
- "The Zanzibar Order in Council, 1904."

Provided as follows:—

(1.) Where other provision is not made by Decree of the Sultan countersigned by the British Agent, any law practice or procedure established by or under the said repealed Orders and all Acts of any legislature in India now in force in Zanzibar shall remain in force until such other provision is made.

(2.) Every appointment of a Judge or other officer and every Court established and existing at the commencement of this Order, shall, until other provision is made, continue to be as if this Order had not been passed.

(3.) All legal proceedings begun under the said repealed Orders and pending at the commencement of this Order, shall be continued as if this Order had not been passed.

(4.) All regulations and rules made under the said repealed Orders, shall remain in force until otherwise provided by Decree of the Sultan, countersigned by the British Agent.

53.—(1.) Until other provision is made by Decree of the Sultan of Zanzibar, countersigned by the British Agent, and subject to the other provisions of this Order, the Code of Criminal Procedure and the other enactments relating to the administration of criminal justice in India, applicable to Zanzibar at the commencement of this Order, shall have effect as if Zanzibar were a district in the Presidency of Bombay; and an Assistant Judge shall be deemed to be the Magistrate of the district; the Judge shall be deemed to be the Sessions Judge; the High Court of Judicature at Bombay (hereinafter called the High Court of Bombay) shall be deemed to be the High Court; and the powers both of the Governor-General in Council and of the Local Government under those enactments shall be exercisable by the Secretary of State, or, with his previous or subsequent assent, by the Governor-General of India in Council.

(2.) Provided, however, that no sentence of death passed by the Court for Zanzibar shall require confirmation by the High Court.

54. Where a person entitled to appeal to the High Court of Bombay from any judgment or order passed in the exercise of criminal jurisdiction under this Order desires so to appeal, he shall present his Petition of appeal to the Court for Zanzibar, and the Petition shall with all practicable speed be transmitted by the Court for Zanzibar to the High Court, with certified copies of the charge (if any) and proceedings, of all documentary evidence admitted or tendered, of the depositions, of the notes of the oral testimony, and of the judgment or order, and any argument on the Petition of appeal that the appellant desires to submit to the High Court.

55. The Court for Zanzibar shall postpone the execution of the sentence pending the appeal, and shall, if necessary, commit the person convicted to prison for safe custody, or detain him in prison for safe custody, or shall admit him to bail, and may take security, by recognizance, deposit of money, or otherwise, for his payment of any fine.

56. Until other provision is made by Decree of the Sultan of Zanzibar, countersigned by the British Agent, and subject to the other provisions of this Order, the Code of Civil Procedure, "The Bombay Civil Courts Act, 1869," the Indian Succession Act, and the other enactments relating to the administration of civil justice in India applicable to Zanzibar at the commencement of this Order shall have effect as if Zanzibar were a district in the Presidency of Bombay; the Judge shall be deemed to be the District Judge, and the Assistant Judge, the Joint District Judge, of the district, and the Court for Zanzibar, the District Court or Principal-Civil Court of Original Jurisdiction in the district; the High Court of Bombay shall be deemed to be the highest Civil Court of Appeal for the district, and the Court authorized to hear appeals from and to revise the decisions of the District Court; and the Powers, both of the Governor-General in Council and the Local Government, under those enactments shall be exercisable by the Secretary of State, or, with his previous or subsequent assent, by the Governor-General of India in Council.

57. Where any person entitled to appeal to the High Court of Bombay from any Decree or Order made by the Court for Zanzibar in the exercise of civil jurisdiction under this Order desires so to appeal, he shall give security to the satisfaction of the Court, and to such amount as the Court thinks reasonable, for prosecution of the appeal, and for payment of any costs that may be ordered by the High Court of Bombay on the appeal to be paid by the appellant, and shall comply with such terms and conditions and take such steps as shall be prescribed by Rules of Court.

58. This Order shall commence and have effect as follows:—

(1.) As to the making of any warrant or appointment under this Order, immediately from and after the date of this Order.

(2.) As to the framing of Rules of Procedure or Regulations, and the approval thereof by the Secretary of State, immediately from and after the date of this Order.

(3.) As to all other matters and provisions comprised and contained in this Order, immediately from and after the expiration of one month after this Order is first exhibited in the public office of the Court, for which purpose the Judge is hereby required forthwith, on receipt by him of a copy of this Order, to affix and exhibit the same conspicuously in the public office of the Court, and he is also hereby required to keep the same so affixed and exhibited during one month from the first exhibition thereof; and notice of the time of such first exhibition shall, as soon thereafter as practicable, be published in Zanzibar in such manner as the Court directs; and, notwithstanding anything in this Order, the time of the expiration of the said month shall be deemed to be the time of the commencement of this Order.

(4.) Proof shall not in any proceeding or matter be required that the provisions of this Article have been complied with, nor shall any act or proceeding be invalidated by any failure to comply with any of such provisions.

59. A copy of this Order shall be kept exhibited conspicuously in the Court at Zanzibar.

1	Law Officers ..	Sept. 2, 1907	Uganda-Congo boundary. Reason why His Majesty's Government can, in their opinion, submit to arbitration question as to whether it should follow what used to be considered to be the 30th meridian. CONGO FREE STATE.

6	Law Officers ..	Feb. 20, 1907	His Majesty's Government has the right, under most-favoured-nation clause of Congo Treaty with Italy, to establish Consular Courts in the Congo Free State. Reasons why Court of Arbitration might decide otherwise. Congo State can claim arbitration on question under Berlin Act of 1885 ..	10
7	Law Officers ..	Mar. 25, 1907	Obstacles to Congo Balobo Mission acquiring sites. Congo State should not adopt a land system out of harmony with Berlin Act and Anglo-Congolese Convention. The former gives full opportunities to foreigners to acquire land, and makes missionaries and their property the subject of a special protection ..	12
8	Law Officers ..	July 3, 1907	Lado Enclave in Congo Free State. Consider lease of remains in force only as long as Leopold II remains Sovereign of the Free State. Think expression "Leopold II," used in Anglo-Congolese Agreement, is merely designatory, though applicable to him only as King of the Belgians ..	16

EGYPT.

10	Law Officers ..	Feb. 6, 1907	Consider His Majesty's Government entitled to set up Military Tribunals (in substitution of existing Special Tribunal) to deal with offences by natives against Army of Occupation. British Diplomatic Agent should decide as to the proper jurisdiction in each particular case. Concur with Report of 1883 (Jurisdiction of French military authorities in Tunis) ..	21

12	Law Officers ..	Mar. 16, 1907	Eddystone lighthouse. His Majesty's Government might properly claim sovereignty over rock on which it stands and exclusive right of fishery, but consider it impolitic to do so. Foreigners may possibly claim prescriptive rights of fishery ..	25

GENERAL.

13	Law Officers ..	Feb. 14, 1907	Status of children of W. Thom and Chinese woman legitimated by subsequent marriage. Should not be registered as British subjects. Cape Government may give them asylum but Cape territory must not be made base of hostile operations. Cannot claim expenses of internment from Germany. Cape Government entitled to prevent use of Orange River for passage of stores into German territory, but exercise of this right may be impolitic ..	32

16	Law Officers ..	Apr. 29, 1907	Pre-emption of articles ancipitis usus . Authorities which support opinion in their Report of 13th December, 1906. Principle should have been applied as regards food-stuffs in "Hsiping" and "Pehping." Suggesting alteration in draft despatch to Tôkiô	36
17	Law Officers ..	Apr. 29, 1907	German steam-ship "Paros" condemned by Japanese Prize Court with cargo. Representation cannot properly be made to Japanese Government on behalf of underwriters. There was deception apparently as to destination of vessel	38
18	Law Officers ..	June 29, 1907	Marriage of Mr. J. E. de Becker with Japanese lady and adoption into her family having made him a Japanese subject, he has ceased to be a British subject if his acts showed voluntary renunciation of British allegiance	42

SPAIN.

23	Law Officers ..	Aug. 23, 1907	Claim of Cuba Submarine Company against Spanish Government for arrears of subsidy. May be preferred diplomatically against Spanish Government. Undertaking was a measure of military necessity for the benefit of Spain, and was contracted for by Central, not by Colonial, Government. His Majesty's Government will probably be prejudiced by reason of the delay and of fact that they previously preferred claim against successors of Spain in Cuba	49

SWITZERLAND.

24A	Law Officers to Home Office	Mar. 4, 1907	Joseph Keller, a Swiss, who has returned to England after escaping from prison during trial in Switzerland for theft committed in England. Consider he can be tried in England; his sentence par contumace in Switzerland would not appear to support a plea of autrefois convict . It does not appear to be final. Swiss Government not justified in demanding his extradition. Consider sentence par contumace to be sufficient for purposes of Aliens Act, and that his offence constitutes an extradition crime for purposes of that Act	51

25B	Law Officers to Colonial Office	Aug. 2, 1907	Prosecution of Canadian fishermen, Crane and Dubois, for putting herrings on American vessels contrary to Bait Act, and their conviction by Newfoundland Courts. Opinion on certain points connected with suggested appeal to Privy Council	55
25C	Law Officers to Colonial Office	Sept. 2, 1907	Modus vivendi with United States with reference to fishery season of 1907. Consider terms of draft Order in Council sufficient to enforce	58
26	Law Officers ..	Dec. 17, 1907	Forfeiture of Concession by Rio Grande Irrigation and Land Company ostensibly owing to delay in execution of works. Claim for compensation can properly be preferred against United States' Government, as delay was caused by action of the United States' Government in instituting unwarrantable litigation. No need to await conclusion of legal proceedings before preferring claim. Proposing reference to Hague Tribunal or Joint Commission	58

[September 2, 1907.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, June 7, 1907.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to request that you will take into consideration the papers noted in the accompanying list respecting—

1. The Uganda-Congo boundary question; and
2. The British claim to the Mfumbiro district.

1. The boundary between the Uganda Protectorate and the Congo Free State is laid down by Article 1 (a) of the Agreement between Great Britain and the Congo Free State of the 12th May, 1894, as follows: "That the sphere of influence of the Independent Congo State shall be limited to the north of the German sphere in East Africa by a frontier following the 30th meridian east of Greenwich up to its intersection by the watershed between the Nile and the Congo, and thence following this watershed in a northerly and north-westerly direction." (Paper (A.))

No map was attached to the original signed Treaty, but the map included in the Blue Book (Paper (A)) in which the Treaty was laid before Parliament shows the position of the line which was supposed to be the 30th meridian. Later and more accurate geographical knowledge has now brought to light the fact that the real position of the 30th meridian is considerably to the east of the line shown on the above map.

A Memorandum by Mr. Wellesley (Paper (G)) contains maps and plans showing the various positions that have from time to time been assigned to this meridian.

His Majesty's Government are of course anxious to claim that the line which was believed to be the 30th meridian at the time of the conclusion of the Treaty of 1894 should be the boundary between the Congo Free State and Uganda. The Congo Government, on the other hand, maintain that the letter of the Treaty must be adhered to, and the true 30th meridian be fixed as the frontier line.

The Congo Free State may claim that this matter should form the subject of a reference to arbitration under Article 12 of the Act of Berlin, 1885 (Paper (C)), and it would therefore be of material assistance to the Secretary of State to have your opinion as to the strength of the British case before deciding what attitude to adopt.

The claim of His Majesty's Government could only be established by proving that the intention of the Treaty was that the boundary should be, not the real 30th meridian, but the line shown as such on the contemporaneous maps.

It is obvious from the map attached to the Blue Book (Paper (A)) that His Majesty's Government were at that time under the impression that the line of frontier to which they had agreed would give them access to Lake Albert Edward. And it may be observed that, as a matter of fact, the whole object of negotiating the Treaty was to secure that the proposed Cape to Cairo Railway should lie entirely within British territory.

If the true 30th meridian be adopted as the frontier, Great Britain will be deprived of access to Lake Albert Edward.

In support of the British contention His Majesty's Government can urge the fact that the strip of territory in dispute was actually occupied and administered by the Uganda Protectorate until, on the discovery that the 30th meridian lay farther to the east, a temporary Agreement was come to between the Congo State and His Majesty's Government to abstain from any act of occupation on the part of either Government until the boundary question had been definitely settled. This fact shows the intention of His Majesty's Government to occupy the country up to the line where the old 30th meridian was supposed to be.

In further evidence of such intention it might, perhaps, be possible to cite the following passage from the Earl of Kimberley's despatch to Mr. Hardinge of the 23rd May, 1894 (see Hertslet's "Map of Africa," p. 1013):—

"In order to secure access to this post, the lease has been obtained of a road passing through the Free State territory, connecting Lake Albert Edward, the eastern shore of which is in the British sphere, with the leased port."

On the other hand, Sir E. Grey is not aware of any evidence that can be produced to prove that it was also the intention of the Congo Free State to place the boundary at the supposed and not at the real position of the 30th meridian.

2. The claim to the Mfumbiro district, though distinct from the Congo-Uganda boundary dispute, may yet, for reasons which will presently appear, be conveniently dealt with at the same time. The Agreement between Great Britain and Germany of the 1st July, 1890, defining the boundary between the British and German spheres (Paper (B)), provides (Article I, Mount Mfumbiro):—

"It is, however, understood that, on the west side of the lake, the German sphere does not comprise Mount Mfumbiro; if that mountain shall prove to lie to the south of the selected parallel, the line shall be deflected so as to exclude it, but shall nevertheless return so as to terminate at the above-named point."

Again:—

"Mount Mfumbiro is included in the British sphere."

At the time when this Treaty was made the exact position of Mfumbiro was not known, but it was claimed by Great Britain and was generally assumed to lie to the south of the 1st parallel of south latitude.

It has now been definitely ascertained that the Mfumbiro district does lie to the south of the 1st parallel south latitude, but a further complication is introduced by the fact that the boundary between the Congo Free State and the German territory is also the subject of dispute, and if the German Government fail to secure the boundary they claim, Mfumbiro may be finally decided to lie within the Free State territory.

The preamble to the Agreement between Great Britain and the Congo State of the 12th May, 1894, however, contains the following words:—

"His Majesty the King of the Belgians, Sovereign of the Independent State of the Congo, having recognized the British sphere of influence as laid down in the Anglo-German Agreement of the 1st July, 1890, Great Britain undertakes to give to His Majesty a lease of territories in the western basin of the Nile," &c.

The Congo Government have stated that they are not prepared to recognize any claim on the part of His Majesty's Government to this district if found west of the true 30th meridian, as under the German-Congolese Convention of 1884 this meridian is to form the boundary between the Congo Free State and German East Africa up to 1° 20' south, and as this case may also have to be referred to arbitration, as provided for under Article 12 of the Act of Berlin, 1885, it is important to know the precise effect of this stipulation in the preamble to the Convention.

It is possible for His Majesty's Government to set up a claim to Mfumbiro either against the German Government on the strength of the 1890 Agreement or against the Congo Free State on the strength of the preamble to the 1894 Agreement, and Sir E. Grey would be glad of your opinion as to which of these courses it would be safer to adopt.

Account must be taken of the fact that, in case of negotiations between the Congo Free State and Germany for the settlement of the Congo-German East African boundary, the latter Power, knowing that if she makes good her claim to Mfumbiro she will have to hand it over to Great Britain, may be disposed to abandon this part of her claim with a view to securing concessions in other portions of the boundary.

Unless you consider, therefore, that His Majesty's Government could argue that, by the Agreement of 1890, Germany guaranteed Mfumbiro to Great Britain, and consequently is bound to obtain it from the Congo Free State, Sir E. Grey has some doubt whether there will be any advantage in putting forward the claim against her.

It will be noted that it is the recognition on the part of the Congo Free State of the British sphere, as determined by the 1890 Agreement with Germany, that forms the consideration for the lease of the Nile territories to the King of the Belgians. In the later portion of Article 1 of the 1890 Agreement with Germany, where the British sphere is defined, Mount Mfumbiro is assigned to Great Britain without any reference to the position of lines either of longitude or latitude, and both the Legal Adviser and the Assistant Legal Adviser to this Department have expressed the opinion that the action of the Congo Free State in taking the lease of the Nile territories in return for her recognition of the British sphere makes the British claim to the Mfumbiro district against the Congo Free State stronger than a claim put forward through Germany.

It is difficult to see what consideration the King of the Belgians gave for the lease of the Nile territories, if the recognition of the British sphere in the preamble of the 1894 Agreement is to be construed as limited to the recognition of the division between Great Britain and Germany of territory with which the Congo Free State was not concerned, and as falling to the ground so soon as the Congo Free State considers herself entitled to claim the territory on her own account.

The strength of the German claim to Mfumbiro is possibly also an element that you may consider should be taken into account in deciding what course to pursue. The details of the dispute between the German Government and the Congo Government as to the boundary between their territories are set out in Mr. Wellesley's Memorandum (Paper (G)), so far as they are known to His Majesty's Government.

It may be well to mention that if the German Government adopted the same arguments as to the 30th meridian that His Majesty's Government desire to put forward the actual line claimed by Germany would not be a continuation of the line claimed by Great Britain, as the German claim dates from 1885, whereas the British claim dates from 1894, and the supposed position of the 30th meridian had altered in the meantime.

You will also observe that as regards the Congo-Uganda boundary His Majesty's Government claim the old 30th meridian as being the intention of the Treaty irrespective of its actual wording, whereas with regard to Mfumbiro they claim the district under the strict letter of the Treaty, and you will no doubt give due weight to the apparent inconsistency of these contentions in advising the Secretary of State as to the course to be adopted.

Sir Edward Grey would be glad if you will be so good as to furnish him with your opinion on the following points:—

1. Whether the contention of His Majesty's Government that the boundary between the Congo Free State and Uganda should coincide with the supposed position of the 30th meridian at the time of the Treaty of 1890 is sufficiently strong to render it reasonably safe to submit the matter to a Court of Arbitration, and, if so, by what line of argument it could be most advantageously supported.

2. Whether Great Britain has a valid claim to the Mfumbiro district, and, if so, whether the claim should be made against the Congo Free State direct or against Germany.

3. Whether the claim to the Mfumbiro district, if any, is strong enough for submission to a Court of Arbitration.

4. Whether, in the event of Germany submitting her boundary dispute with the Congo State to arbitration and the Award going against her, the British claim to Mfumbiro on the strength of the recognition by the Free State of the British sphere as laid down in the Agreement of 1890 would be prejudiced thereby.

Sir Edward Grey would also be glad to receive any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer on the foregoing subjects.

As the question whether the British claim to Mfumbiro should be brought up at a proposed Conference on questions relating to the Aka will depend largely on the conclusion at which you may arrive, I am to request that Sir E. Grey may be favoured with your views at your early convenience in order that a reply may be sent to the German Government in regard to their proposal to refer the latter question to arbitration.

Report.

(1.) We are of opinion that the contention of His Majesty's Government that the boundary between the Congo Free State and Uganda should coincide with the supposed position of the 30th meridian is strong enough for submission to a Court of Arbitration with a fairly reasonable chance of success.

It is clear that at the date of the Treaty the Government of Great Britain were mistaken as to the true position of the 30th meridian. It is certain that the King of the Belgians did not then know the true position of that meridian, and it is probable that he, like Great Britain, was mistaken in the position, if any, which he then ascribed to it. The Treaty, however, is founded on the assumption that the position of the 30th meridian was then ascertained or approximately ascertained, and arrangements were obviously made between the parties as to particular districts on that assumption. Thus it was agreed that Great Britain should have the lease of a 25 kilom. strip between Lake Tanganika and Lake Albert Edward. It must have been within the knowledge and intention of both the parties that the object of this lease was to give access as between British Central and British East Africa. This result could only be achieved if Lake Albert Edward were partly within British East Africa, and that it should be so treated was apparently the intention of both parties. It now appears that it is to the west of the 30th meridian, and if the true position of that meridian is to be taken as the boundary, the lake is outside of British territory altogether, and the connection between it and Lake Tanganika is useless.

We think, therefore, that, in selecting the 30th meridian as a boundary, both parties were acting under a mistake of fact which, now that the true position of the meridian is ascertained, gives rise to a claim either for rescission or for rectification, so that the clear purpose and consideration of the Agreement may be expressed by its words.

There would equally be a good claim for rescission or rectification if it were the fact that the Congo Free State knew that on entering into the Treaty Great Britain agreed to the boundary in question on the assumption that both parties intended such boundary to be one which would place Lake Albert Edward within or in connection with British territory.

(2 and 3.) We think Great Britain has a claim to the Mfumbiro district against either Germany or the Congo Free State sufficiently strong for submission to a Court of Arbitration. In our opinion, it would be preferable to prefer the claim against the Free State.

(4.) We think not.

[November 12, 1907.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 30, 1907.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you the accompanying despatch from His Majesty's Agent and Consul-General at Zanzibar,* forwarding a request from Acting Judge Murison for a definite ruling upon a point of law relating to the jurisdiction of the Judges of the Appeal Court for Eastern Africa.

Confirmation of death sentences by Zanzibar Appeal Court: as to two Judges sufficing.

You will observe that the point in question is whether a confirmation of a death sentence is valid if signed by only two Judges of the Court of Appeal, or whether it must be signed by three Judges of that Court.

Sir E. Grey is of opinion that a confirmation of a sentence of death passed by a Court of Session is valid if signed by two only of the Judges of the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa, and that the signatures of three Judges of that Court are not essential to the validity of such confirmation.

The question appears to depend solely upon the construction of certain sections of the Bombay Criminal Procedure Code. Under section 374 a sentence of death passed by a Court of Session must be submitted for confirmation to the "High Court," which, by section 4 (j), is defined as meaning "the highest Court of Criminal Appeal or Revision for any local area," and in Zanzibar the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa corresponds with that definition. Section 375, which enables the High Court, as so defined, to confirm a sentence of death so submitted to it, provides that no order of confirmation shall be made until the period allowed for preferring an appeal has lapsed, or, if an appeal is presented within such period, until such appeal is disposed of.

This would seem to distinguish in effect between the formal confirmation of a death sentence and an appeal in criminal cases.

Section 377 in terms provides that the confirmation of the sentence shall, when the High Court consists of two or more Judges, be made and signed by at least two of them.

For the purposes of the Bombay Criminal Procedure Code, the "High Court" in Zanzibar is represented by the Court of Appeal for East Africa. This Court "consists of two or more Judges," and it would seem to follow that, under section 377, the confirmation of a death sentence must be "made and signed by at least two of them."

In other words, jurisdiction for this purpose would seem by this section to be conferred on any two of the Judges.

"The Appeal Court Order in Council, 1902," Article 5, and the Appeal Court Rules 17 and 18 do not appear to affect the question. They obviously are applicable only to appeals in the strict sense, and not to the formal confirmation of a death sentence, the procedure as to which is expressly provided for by the sections of the Criminal Procedure Code referred to above.

I am to request that you will be so good as to take this paper into your consideration, and furnish Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to whether a confirmation of a death sentence is legally valid if signed by only two Judges of the Court of Appeal, or whether it is essential that it should be signed by three Judges.

It may be added that the practical importance of this question is due to the fact that on many occasions three Judges are not available for this purpose, one of the three frequently being absent on leave.

Sir E. Grey will also be glad to receive any general observations on the subject which you may wish to offer.

I have, &c.

Belgian

survey.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you the papers, noted in the accompanying list, with regard to the claim of the Belgian Government that the Belgian mail-steamers plying between Dover and Ostend are vessels belonging to a Sovereign State and consequently exempt from any survey on the part of the Board of Trade in connection with "The British Merchant Shipping

* The Order in Council dated July 6, 1907, is contained in Confidential Print No. 8996*. The Law Officers returned the draft Order unaltered.

Act, 1906." The grounds on which the Belgian Government put forward this claim are that the steamers in question represent a portion of the Belgian navy, fly the pennant, are commanded by officers commissioned by the King of the Belgians, and are under the direction of the Minister of Railways, Mails, and Telegraphs.

By section 13 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1906," the definition of a "passenger steamer," as laid down in section 267 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," is amended so as to include every foreign steam-ship, whether originally proceeding from a port in the United Kingdom or from a port out of the United Kingdom, which carries passengers to or from any place in the United Kingdom. It follows therefore that the Belgian mail-steamers which carry passengers between Dover and Ostend are "passenger steamers" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Acts, and subject to the provisions of those Acts when in the territorial waters of the United Kingdom.

In the leading case of "The Exchange," 1812, 7 Cranch 116, however, it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that if a ship be declared by the sovereign authority by the usual means to be a ship of war, such declaration cannot be inquired into. This rule was approved by the English Court of Appeal in the case of the "Parlement Belge," in which case it was held that an unarmed packet belonging to the Belgian Sovereign, and in the hands of officers commissioned by him and employed in carrying mails, was not liable to be seized in an Admiralty suit to recover damages for a collision; nor was such immunity held to be lost by reason of merchandize or passengers having been carried for hire.

In view of these judicial decisions, His Majesty's Government feel precluded from denying that the Dover-Ostend mail-steamers, which the Belgian Government in an official note to His Majesty's Minister at Brussels have declared to be public ships, possess that character. Sir E. Grey considers, however, that he would be justified in addressing a formal protest to the Belgian Government against the continued use of these public ships for purposes inconsistent with their public character. In his opinion, it is incompatible with the character of a public ship to trade and carry merchandize or passengers for hire, and the course adopted by the Belgian Government seems to him open to grave objections.

I am to request that you will be good enough to take the above facts into your consideration, and to favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to the attitude which His Majesty's Government should adopt in the matter, and generally with any observations which you may have to offer on the subject; and in this connection I am to call your special attention to the copy, inclosed herewith, of the reference to the Law Officers of the 28th February, 1900, and of their Report, on a somewhat similar point.

Report.

In our opinion, as the mail-steamers above mentioned are the property of a foreign Sovereign, and are used for what that Sovereign alleges to be public purposes, the Courts will not exercise over them the general jurisdiction conferred by "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1906."

The case does not appear to differ in any material respect from that of the "Parlement Belge" (5 Probate Div. 197), which is an authority in favour of the contention now raised by the King of the Belgians. In that case the trading purposes for which the vessel was used were held to be subordinate to the public purpose of carrying the mails; but the distinction between trading purposes and public purposes was not very clearly or consistently drawn, and, as the authorities now stand, is of doubtful value. The effective ground of decision in the various cases on the point appears to be that the vessel under consideration in each case was the property of a foreign Sovereign.

We are, however, of opinion that the judicial dicta laying stress on the user for public purposes of the vessels thus exempt afford good ground for a formal protest, which may properly be made against the use of such vessels for purposes of a private trading character, though, in fact, they happen to be undertaken by a Sovereign Power.

Draft
China and Corea
and Corea
Orders in Council.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, December 31, 1906.

I HAVE the honour to transmit to you herewith, by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the drafts of a Corea Order in Council and a China and Corea Order in Council, which have been prepared in this Department.

The passing of Corea under the sway of Japan, and the withdrawal of His Majesty's Legation from that country, have rendered the provisions of the draft Corea Order in Council necessary.

The draft China and Corea Order has been framed for the purpose of introducing certain amendments which experience has shown to be desirable in "The China and Corea Order, 1904."

Article 2 deals with a question that arose before the 1904 Order was passed, but it was by an oversight omitted from that Order.

It has in practice been found convenient in some cases to station a subordinate Vice-Consul with legal qualifications within the district of another commissioned Consular officer in order that he may exercise civil and criminal jurisdiction. To enable this to be done consistently with the terms of the existing Order in Council it is necessary to resort to the somewhat cumbrous machinery of assigning to the junior officer a district which coincides and is conterminous with that of the superior officer, and there are no means of limiting the classes of cases with which he may deal.

Article 3 deals with the question of the protection of trade-marks, &c., and is to replace both "The China and Corea Patents Order, 1899," and the 69th Article of the 1904 Order in Council, which overlap, and the former of which should have been repealed in 1904.

Arrangements have been made with various foreign Powers for the mutual protection of each other's trade-marks in China, but the Japanese Government has expressed objection to the Minister's consent being required in all cases before a prosecution can be initiated. This stipulation is only contained in the 1899 Order in Council, and does not appear in that of 1904.

Article 69 of the 1904 Order, however, introduces a new element by necessitating a proof in Court that equal opportunities are given in the foreign Court concerned for punishing offences against British trade-marks. In Sir E. Grey's opinion no such proof ought to be required where His Majesty's Government have Agreements in force with foreign Powers for the reciprocal protection of trade-marks, &c.

The Orders in Council at present in force contain no provision making the institution of a civil suit by a foreigner against a British subject to recover damages for infringing a trade-mark dependent on foreign Courts providing similar facilities; the proviso being limited to criminal proceedings. Article 4 has been framed to meet this point.

The list of Acts mentioned in the clause has been slightly added to at the suggestion of the Board of Trade, and the provision, rendering proof of the exhibition of those Acts a condition precedent to a prosecution, has been omitted in the case of Acts which are now and have been for some time exhibited in the offices of the Consulate.

Article 5. The object of the change that has been made by the wording of sub-Articles (1), (3), and (4), as compared with Article 75 of the principal Order, is to include persons stirring up disaffection against the Japanese in Corea.

Sub-Article (2) has been framed to meet the case of Companies publishing newspapers in China where none of the individuals connected with or employed by the Company is amenable to British jurisdiction, though the Company has been registered in a British possession and enjoys a British status in consequence.

Newspapers owned by such Companies registered in Hong Kong have been a source of considerable trouble in some of the Treaty ports in China. The Article is concurred in by the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

Article 84 of the 1904 Order has become a dead letter because the Government of Hong Kong refuse to receive persons deported from China; and therefore they cannot, under Article 83 (4), be sent there. On the other hand, from some of the Treaty ports in China it is extremely inconvenient to deport persons to the country to which they belong without their being transhipped at Hong Kong, and Article 6, which has been drafted by the authorities of that Colony, will enable such persons to be more easily dealt with there. The terms of the Article appear to Sir E. Grey to be warranted by section 8 of "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890."

Articles 7, 9, 10, 11, and 12 are inserted at the suggestion of Sir H. de Sausmarez, the Judge of His Majesty's Court at Shanghai, for reasons which he gives in his despatch No. 9 of the 3rd April, 1906 (Paper (D)).

Article 8 introduces a change which has been inserted in several recent Foreign Jurisdiction Orders in consequence of a case that arose in the Ottoman Empire, where the executor to a large estate, finding it cheaper to pay the fine, refused to take out probate.

Article 13 has been inserted because it has been found, in the course of a general codification of the subordinate legislation in force in China that is now being undertaken, that the penalties prescribed in Article 155 (3) of the 1904 Order are inadequate, and are less than those imposed in some cases by the Regulations in force.

Article 14 substitutes approval by the Secretary of State for approval by His Majesty the King, so as to place King's Regulations in China on the same footing as those enacted under other Foreign Jurisdiction Orders.

Article 15 has been inserted because the Judge of His Majesty's Supreme Court at Shanghai (Sir H. de Sausmarez) entertains a most lively objection to the existing Article 27 of the 1904 Order, which is inserted under the heading of "Jurisdiction of the Courts," and appears to direct the Judge of the Court, quid Judge, to interfere in disputes which have not been made the subject of litigation. Article 27 has therefore been repealed and re-enacted, so as to impose the duty of endeavouring to effect reconciliation on the Consular officers concerned in their Consular and not in their Judicial capacity.

The repeal of "The China and Corea (Supreme Court) Order in Council, 1900," was, so far as Sir E. Grey can ascertain, omitted from "The China and Corea Order, 1904," by mistake.

I have the honour to request that you will take the two draft Orders into your consideration, together with the papers noted in the accompanying list, and favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to whether their terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

Sir E. Grey will at the same time be glad to receive any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen, Foreign Office, February 4, 1907.

Right of this country to exercise extra-territorial jurisdiction in the Congo
Free State.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to request that you will be so good as to take into your consideration the papers noted on the accompanying list relating to the right of His Majesty's Government to establish Consular Courts in the Congo Free State.

You are no doubt aware that the maladministration in the territory of the Free State has attracted a great deal of public attention in this country of recent years, and suggestions have from time to time been made both to the Marquess of Lansdowne and to Sir Edward Grey that the establishment of British Consular Courts in the Congo Free State would have a very salutary effect upon that Government.

Before committing himself in any way, however, for or against the proposal, Sir Edward Grey is anxious to obtain your opinion as to certain points connected therewith.

The foundation of any claim on the part of His Majesty's Government to the exercise of extra-territorial jurisdiction in the Free State must be the Convention between this country and the International Association of the Congo of the 16th December, 1884 (Paper A).

Part of the preamble of that document runs:—

"And whereas it is expedient to regulate and define the rights of British subjects in the territories of the said Free State, and to provide for the exercise of civil and criminal jurisdiction over them, in manner hereinafter mentioned, until sufficient provision shall have been made by the Association for the administration of justice among foreigners, &c. It is hereby agreed as follows:—"

Later, in the body of the Convention, Article V provides that: "Every British Consul or Consular officer within the said territories, who shall be thereunto duly authorized by His Britannic Majesty's Government, may hold a Consular Court for the district assigned to him, and shall exercise sole and exclusive jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, over the persons and property of British subjects within the same in accordance with British law."

By Article III Great Britain is entitled to most-favoured-nation treatment.

A despatch (Sir A. Hardinge's No. 1, Africa, of the 2nd January, 1907 (Paper B)) from His Majesty's Minister at Brussels gives a useful summary of the provisions of the various Treaties in force between the Free State and other Powers in regard to extra-territorial jurisdiction, and the full text of these documents will be found in the accompanying volume of "Hertslet's Map of Africa by Treaty." You will observe that there is no passage in the Italian Treaty, which has no preamble similar to that in the British Treaty, suggesting that the right to establish Courts is only temporary, and the question arises whether, if Italy's rights in this respect are unqualified, Great Britain is not placed by the most-favoured-nation clause in the same position.

In 1890 the Congo Government approached His Majesty's Government with a view to the surrender by the latter of their rights to extra-territorial jurisdiction. It was pointed out by the Congo Government that those rights were no longer essential to the interests of foreign residents in the Independent State, and that the Congolese Courts had then been in existence for four years, and had given satisfaction to the resident subjects of all the foreign Powers having Treaty rights with the Free State. After careful consideration of the matter His Majesty's Government decided that, in order as far as possible to meet the wishes of the Congo Government, they would abstain from establishing Consular Courts, though they would not abandon their right to do so should circumstances render that course necessary. A reply in this sense was returned to the Congolese overtures, and His Majesty's Consul at Boma was at the same time instructed not to exercise extra-territorial jurisdiction unless he should receive special instructions to that effect. No such instructions have been issued.

Considerable difficulties would be met with if His Majesty's Government endeavoured to justify the establishment of Consular Courts on the ground that "sufficient provision had not been made for the administration of justice among foreigners." The legal and judicial machinery in the Free State has been steadily developed during the twenty years of the State's existence, and is, on paper, quite as complete as those of other Central African territories, nor would it be easy for the Secretary of State to instance a series of miscarriages or denials of justice to British subjects that would enable him to say that the Courts were completely failing in the purpose for which they were created.

The only substantial point that has been made against the legal system in the Congo is that the Courts have always acted in subordination to the Executive in that the Procureur d'Etat is dependent on orders from the Governor-General as regards proceedings against foreigners, but here again Sir E. Grey can cite no case in which a British subject has suffered serious injustice in consequence of this system, and the complaint could only be made against the principle. The Commission of Inquiry recommended in their Report that the Procureur d'Etat should act independently of the Governor-General in all cases except that of an offence against the security of the State. Sir Edward Grey is not aware whether the recommendation of the Commission was adopted and enforced by Decree, but it is obvious that the exception in favour of "offences against the security of State" would lend itself to abuse.

If therefore any attempt is now to be made to set up an extra-territorial jurisdiction in the Free State it is of great importance to know how far the wording of the Preamble to the Convention of 1884 qualifies the specific provision of Article V of the Treaty, and whether the absence of any such statement in the Preamble of the Italian Convention coupled with the most-favoured-nation clause in the British Treaty improves the position of His Majesty's Government.

Another point which arises in this connection is whether the Congo Free State would be able to claim as a matter of right under Article XII of "The Act of Berlin, 1835" (to which the Congo State adhered), arbitration on the question whether His Majesty's Government were entitled to set up extra-territorial Courts.

If it can be said that the right of His Majesty's Government to set up such Courts is perfectly clear Sir Edward Grey conceives that arbitration might possibly be avoided on the ground that the objection of the Free State Government did not amount to a "serious disagreement" within the meaning of Article XII.

It is not improbable that debates on the subject of the Congo may take place in Parliament at an early date in the forthcoming Session, and accordingly if it should be possible for you to furnish your Report before the opening of Parliament, or soon after that date, this would be of the greatest assistance to the Secretary of State.

I am therefore to request that you will be so good as to take these papers into your consideration, and furnish Sir E. Grey with your opinion—

1. Whether His Majesty's Government are entitled under the Convention of 1884 to establish at the present time Consular Courts in the Congo Free State;

2. Whether, if His Majesty's Government assert such a claim, the Congo Free State would be entitled under the Berlin Act, 1885, to demand as of right that the question should be referred to arbitration.

Sir E. Grey will also be glad to receive any further observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer on the papers submitted to you herewith.

Report.

1. In our opinion His Majesty's Government are entitled to establish at the present time Consular Courts in the Congo Free State, though having regard to the total disuse of that right on our part, and to the numerous cases in which we have acknowledged the jurisdiction of the Congolese Courts, a Court of Arbitration might erroneously, though not improbably, take a different view.

The power to establish such Courts under Article V of the Convention of 1884, is a matter of some doubt, owing to the words in the Preamble which show that the parties to the Convention only contemplated the operation of Article V until the Association had itself made sufficient provision for the administration of justice among foreigners, but we think that the operation of clause 3 (most-favoured-nation clause) gives this country all benefits conferred upon Italy by the Treaty of the 19th December, 1884. In that Treaty the right to establish Consular Courts is not qualified by words like those appearing in the Preamble of the English Treaty, and Great Britain accordingly possesses the right in question under Article III, if not under Article V. The fact that the two Treaties were negotiated together appears to indicate that the English Treaty was not to have the narrow construction which might be implied from the Preamble but which would be inconsistent with the unqualified right appearing in the Italian Treaty.

2. We think that if His Majesty's Government assert the claim in question, the Congo Free State would be entitled to demand as of right that the question be referred to arbitration under Article XII of "The Berlin Act of 1885."

[March 25, 1907.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, February 6, 1907.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you certain letters that have been received from the Congo Balolo Mission with reference to the difficulties that they have experienced with regard to the sites of their Mission stations in the Congo Free State, and also with regard to the obstacles that have been placed in their way in acquiring sites for new stations.

With the details of these various cases Sir E. Grey does not propose to trouble you; the question on which he desires to be furnished with your opinion is as to the construction and interpretation that His Majesty's Government are entitled to place on the provisions of the Berlin Act and of the Anglo-Congolese Convention of 1884, giving British subjects the right to buy and hold land in the Free State.

Article V of the Berlin Act says (as to the conventional basin of the Congo):—

"Foreigners without distinction shall enjoy the right of acquiring and transferring movable and immovable possessions."

Article II of the Convention of 1884 between His Majesty's Government and the International Association of the Congo says:—

"British subjects shall have at all times the right of sojourning and of establishing themselves within the territories which are or shall be under the government of the said Association . . . especially they shall have the right of buying or selling . . . lands and buildings . . ."

In the early days of the Independent State waste and ownerless lands were declared to be vested in the State (see Decree of the 1st July, 1885, Paper C). Similar steps have been taken in other Central African territories, including the British Protectorates of East Africa, Uganda, and British Central Africa, and as the effect is merely to give the central Power complete control over the land, no objection can be taken to such enactments. Since that time what is known as the Concession system has been introduced in the Congo Free State, and at the present time practically the entire area of the State is vested either—

- (a.) In the Sovereign personally, who works the rubber for his personal benefit; or
- (b.) In the State itself, and the rubber is worked for the benefit of the State; or
- (c.) In trading Companies who have received grants of the land which make them for a limited time proprietors; or
- (d.) Vested technically in the State, but virtually in trading Companies who have received grants of an exclusive right of "exploitation" of the forest produce.

The trading Companies referred to in both (c) and (d) are to a great extent under State control; the State holds, it is believed in all cases, a substantial portion of the share capital, and as the rights of the Companies in the land are limited both in time and in interest, it is probably the case that without State co-operation they could not grant a permanent interest in any particular piece of land for the purpose of establishing a Mission station, even if they were willing to do so. There can be no doubt, however, that the Protestant missionaries, on account of their activity, their independence, and their fearless championship of the rights of the natives, have been found an inconvenience by the Congo Government and its Sovereign, and no assistance will be forthcoming from the Congo Government for any extension of the labours of the Protestant missionaries. It may safely be assumed that this is the real reason of the difficulty the Congo Balolo Mission have experienced with regard to the sites of their existing or contemplated Mission stations.

A letter from the Baptist Missionary Society bearing on the same subject is also included in the papers, from which it will be seen that grants of land are not refused to Roman Catholic Missions in districts where they are refused to the Protestants, despite the fact that Article VI extends equal encouragement to the missionaries of all denominations.

The position is, therefore, briefly, that all the land in the Congo Free State is vested in the Sovereign, in the Government, or in trading Companies under effective Government control, and that the Government give the Protestant missionaries little or no facilities for securing sites for Mission stations, though they (the Government) prefer the method of offering impossible swamps to a definite refusal of any land at all for such sites.

The allegation has been made by M. Cattier, a recent Belgian writer on affairs in the Congo Free State, that it is by adopting a similar method in the so-called "Free Zone" of the Crown lands, i.e., by refusing to grant any land for the erection of factories for independent traders, that the Government has succeeded in preserving the whole rubber trade there in its own hands, though the rubber trade in the district is nominally free to all.

The Congo Balolo Mission have appealed to the Secretary of State for diplomatic assistance, and it has therefore become a matter of great importance to know what is the precise effect of the Treaty provisions referred to above giving the British subjects the right to buy and hold land in the Congo Free State.

It is obvious that these provisions cannot mean that an individual land-owner can be compelled to sell his land to a would-be British purchaser against his will. It does not follow, however, that the same rule applies where the owner of the land is the State that made the Treaty, and it may reasonably be urged that a person anxious to acquire land at a particular place may look to the State to sell him that land at a reasonable price, unless the State can prove that the site in question is required for its own use.

Even, however, if this view should be, in your opinion, correct, it would not benefit the Missionary Societies in the districts where either the land or the use of the land has been granted to trading Companies, which theoretically are independent bodies, and the question arises whether any further assistance can be obtained from the Treaties.

At the time when these Treaties were made the Concession system was unknown, and in all civilized countries land was held in parcels of all sizes—great and small.

It has been, however, the custom in certain countries, e.g., at one time in the United Kingdom, to exclude aliens from the ownership of land.

As owners of land are entitled, if they so desire, to sell their property, it usually happens that a foreigner anxious to buy land can, unless excluded because he is an alien, find in any European country land for sale suitable for his purpose. The primary purpose, therefore, of the Treaty provisions referred to above probably was to prevent the enactment in the Free State of laws excluding foreigners from the tenure of land, but the question arises whether they imply anything more.

Mr. Hurst, the Assistant Legal Adviser to this Department, has expressed the opinion, and Mr. Davidson, the Legal Adviser, is inclined to take the same view, that the stipulations with regard to land presuppose that the land system to be introduced would be on lines similar to those of European countries under which land is a marketable commodity, and impliedly exclude a system under which no land can be bought at all by any one.

This view has been set out in various Minutes, included in the papers herewith, to which I am to invite your attention.

If you think that this view is sound, it would be possible for Sir E. Grey to approach the Congo Government and urge that land for Mission stations should be sold to the Societies or to traders where the land is not required for other purposes.

I am to request that you will take these papers into your consideration and furnish Secretary Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to what is the true interpretation and effect of the stipulations as to the purchase of land by British subjects in the Berlin Act and the Anglo-Congolese Convention.

The Secretary of State would also be glad to receive such observations of a general nature as you may be good enough to offer.

Report.

The purpose and effect of Articles V and VI of the Berlin Act and Article II of the Anglo-Congolese Convention have a much wider scope than merely to prevent aliens from being placed under a legal disability to own or occupy land in the Congo. The provisions of the Berlin Act are in our opinion intended to secure fair and equal opportunities for the acquisition of land and the carrying on of trade or mission work to the subjects of all the Signatory Powers, and under Article II of the Convention there is a further express recognition of the right of British subjects to acquire lands. From the papers before us it seems clear that such opportunities are not now accorded to British subjects in the Congo Free State, either in respect of trade or religious work.

It is difficult to maintain that the effect of the above Treaty provisions is to compel the Congo Free State to set up any particular land system of the kind existing in European countries, but we think that in adopting a land system suitable to its condition that State must not allow such a system to operate so as to interfere with the performance of its Treaty obligations. Thus the State may properly declare itself the owner of all vacant or public land, and may exact a reasonable price from any person who desires to trade or settle on such land, but it clearly may not treat the vast State domain as though it were identical in character with a merely private property over which no one but the owner has any rights. To do that would directly and completely nullify the Treaties upon the faith of which the Congolese Government was allowed to assume possession.

It is impossible to draw the precise line at which the exercise by the State of its rights of ownership may come into definite conflict with its Treaty obligations to foreigners. It is a matter of degree. The State may sell lands and grant trading Concessions, perhaps upon a very considerable scale, so long as it acts impartially as between its own subjects and those of all the Signatory Powers, and does not in effect close the country to general trade, exploitation, and settlement on the part of the subjects of those Powers.

But there appears to us to be no doubt on the facts before us that the Congo Free State have used their administrative rights, in regard to the ownership of land and the granting of Concessions, in such a way as to defeat the Treaty rights of foreigners to trade and settle in the Congo.

The case with regard to missions and missionaries appears to be even stronger than the case as to trading rights. Article VI of the Berlin Act declares that Christian missionaries and their property shall be objects of a special protection, and that their right to build edifices and organize missions shall not be limited or fettered in any way whatsoever.

Missionaries are therefore entitled to carry on their work wherever natives are to be found, and especially in or near villages or Settlements. For this purpose they are entitled to acquire a reasonable quantity of land which may not be required for the purposes of the State, and the Government ought not to grant any Concessions, or

Lado
Enclave in Congo Free State:
Terms of lease.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, June 3, 1907.

I HAVE the honour to transmit to you herewith, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, the accompanying question asked in Parliament by Mr. Fell on the 27th ultimo, together with the answer which he returned to it, relative to the terms on which the territory known as the Lado Enclave is leased to the Independent Congo State.

I have also the honour to inclose other papers bearing on the subject, as noted in the margin of this letter.

You will observe that, by the Agreement between Great Britain and the Independent Congo State, signed on the 12th May, 1894 (Paper B), the former grants (Article II, paragraph 1) to His Majesty Leopold II, Sovereign of the State, a lease of certain territories defined in paragraph 2 of the same Article for the period of time specified in paragraph 3, viz., "during the reign of His Majesty Leopold II, Sovereign of the Independent Congo State."

The territories so leased may be found on the inclosed map (Paper D), surrounded by a mauve line.

By paragraph 4 of the same Article it is stipulated that the above lease shall nevertheless remain in force at the expiration of His Majesty's reign as far as a certain portion of these territories is concerned. The Lado Enclave was not, however, included in this portion, and the lease of it is therefore governed by the terms of paragraph 3 of this Article, and terminates with "the reign of His Majesty Leopold II, Sovereign of the Independent Congo State."

By paragraph 5 it is provided that "this extended lease shall be continued so long as the Congo territories, as an independent State or as a Belgian Colony, remain under the sovereignty of His Majesty or His Majesty's successors," but this paragraph, as we have seen above, does not concern the Lado Enclave.

By Article I of the Agreement between the same parties, signed on the 9th May, 1906 (Paper C), the above lease is annulled as regards all the territory in question, except the Lado Enclave, which King Leopold is to "continue during his reign to occupy on the same conditions as at present," conditions, as above said, which are laid down in Article II, paragraph 3, of the former Agreement.

Before answering the question whether the transfer of the territories of the Independent Congo State to the Belgian Government will affect the lease of the Lado Enclave, it is clearly necessary to know the precise meaning to be attached to the phrase "the reign of His Majesty Leopold II, Sovereign of the Independent Congo State."

Is this expression to be taken as referring to the exercise of His Majesty's sovereignty over the territories now comprised in that State so long only as it preserves its present political status, and as excluding the exercise of that sovereignty over the same territories should they cease to form the Independent Congo State and become a Belgian Colony?

Or—in view of the fact that His Majesty is here spoken of as "Leopold II," a title which he may be held to enjoy only as King of the Belgians, since he is the first Sovereign of the Independent Congo State—is it intended that his occupation of the Lado Enclave should continue till the end of his reign over Belgium, and such dependencies as that country may possess?

If the former interpretation is correct, the lease of the Lado Enclave would appear to terminate automatically with the cessation of the existence of the Independent Congo State as a State and the transfer of its territories to the Belgian Government.

If the latter explanation is the true one, the lease would end only with the reign of Leopold II, King of the Belgians.

The nature of the reply to the second question raised by Mr. Fell would presumably be determined by the interpretation of the doubtful phrase. If the first is adopted, that reply would be in the negative; if the second, in the affirmative.

I am to request that you will take these papers into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to what meaning should be attached to the expression in question.

I have, &c.

Report.

The words "This lease shall remain in force during the reign of His Majesty Leopold II, Sovereign of the Independent Congo State," used in Article 2 of the Agreement of the 12th May, 1894, refer to the reign of His Majesty as Sovereign of the Independent Congo State, and the lease of the Lado Enclave will terminate automatically with the cessation of the existence of the Independent Congo State as a State and the transfer of its territories to the Belgian Government.

It is true that the words "Leopold II" are only applicable to His Majesty as King of the Belgians, but we think that the use of those words is merely designatory, and that the capacity in which His Majesty King Leopold contracts is intended to be indicated by the expression "Sovereign of the Independent Congo State."

The contingency of His Majesty ceasing to be Sovereign of the Independent Congo State was foreseen by the framers of the Agreement, and provision is made in Article 2 for the continuance of the lease over part of the area in that event, but the Lado Enclave is excluded from that provision.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 6, 1907.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you the papers noted on the accompanying list on the subject of the proposed prosecution under the provisions of "The China and Corea (Amendment) Order in Council, 1907," of Mr. E. T. Bethell, a British subject resident in Corea, for the publication of articles calculated to stir up bad feeling against the Japanese Government.

His Majesty's Government are desirous to do all in their power to meet the wishes in the matter of the Japanese Government, who have made representations on the

Mr. E. T.
Bethell's seditious

subject, and instructions were therefore issued on the 27th ultimo to Mr. Cockburn, His Majesty's Consul-General at Seoul, to take proceedings against Mr. Bethell under Article 5 of the Order in Council, provided that the published matter complained of constituted, in his opinion, an offence against that Article, and provided that the Crown Advocate at Shanghai advised that it was reasonably strong and the prosecution was likely to succeed (see telegram No. 1 to Mr. Cockburn attached, paper (D)).

I am to state that no copies of the articles already published by Mr. Bethell have been received in this Department, but that, in any case, it is only intended that proceedings shall be instituted against him after the formalities necessary to bring the Order in Council into operation have been complied with, and then only in the event of the publication of further articles of a character which, in the opinion of the Acting Crown Advocate, brings the printer, publisher, or vendor thereof within the language of Article 5 of the Order.

Article 5 (3) runs as follows:—

"Matter calculated to excite tumult or disorder, or to excite enmity between His Majesty's subjects and the Government of China or the Government of Korea, or the authorities or subjects of any Power in amity with His Majesty, being within the limits of this Order, or between the Government of China and its subjects, or the Government of Korea and its subjects, shall be deemed to be seditious matter within the meaning of this Article."

Article 5 (1) runs thus:—

"Every person subject to the criminal jurisdiction of the Court who prints, publishes, or offers for sale any printed or written newspaper or other publication containing seditious matter shall be guilty of a grave offence against the principal Order, and may, in addition to, or in lieu of, any other punishment, be ordered to give security for good behaviour, and in default thereof, or on a further conviction for the like offence, he may be ordered to be deported."

Mr. Cockburn has now drawn attention to the fact that the articles in Mr. Bethell's newspaper are published in the Korean language, are not intended for the perusal of British subjects, and have no circulation among them; and he mentions that the first clause of section 3 of Article 5 has not hitherto been considered a safe basis for proceeding. Mr. Cockburn raises the question whether a conviction could be obtained under Article 5 of the Order in Council (papers (I) and (J)); and he suggests the advisability of avoiding difficulties by passing a brief amended Order in Council, placing Japanese officials in Korea on the same footing as the Korean Government. On the other hand, the Crown Advocate in China and Korea considers that the first clause of section 3 of Article 5 of the Order in Council of 1907 is wide enough to cover the circumstances in a proper case.

The offence of publishing seditious matter (as defined by Article 5 (1) and (3) of the Order in Council of 1907) has been committed if the newspaper articles contain matter calculated—

- (a.) To excite tumult or disorder; or
- (b.) To excite enmity between—
 - (i.) His Majesty's subjects and the Government of China; or
 - (ii.) His Majesty's subjects and the Government of Korea; or
 - (iii.) His Majesty's subjects and the authorities or subjects of any friendly Power (which would clearly include Japan); or
 - (iv.) The Government of China and Chinese subjects; or
 - (v.) The Government of Korea and Korean subjects.

If any matter has in fact any of the tendencies above described, the language in which such matter is published (e.g., Korean, Chinese, Japanese, or English) is, in Sir E. Grey's opinion, wholly immaterial.

As stated above, this Department is not in possession of any specimens of the published matter complained of, and the question whether or not the matter published is calculated to produce any of the specified mischievous results is of course one which must be determined by the Supreme Court (see Article 5 (4) of the Order in Council).

Assuming, however, that these articles published in the Korean newspaper are of an unequivocally inflammatory or revolutionary type, and are directly aimed against the existing Japanese Administration in Korea, it would appear that Mr. Bethell has committed offences which would justify and support a prosecution under the Order in Council of 1907, Article 5 (1) and (3), for the publication of seditious matter, since he might properly be charged with the commission of at least two distinct classes of offence, namely:—

(1.) The publication in a newspaper of matter calculated to excite tumult or disorder.

(2.) The publication in a newspaper of matter calculated to excite enmity between the Government of Korea and its subjects.

Having regard to recent political events in Korea, the result of which is that the de facto Government of Korea will be largely administered by Japanese officials, both as regards home or internal policy and foreign or external policy, although the nominal or titular Head of the Government continues to be the Emperor of Korea (paper (K)), it appears to Sir E. Grey that Mr. Bethell, in publishing articles tending to produce hatred and contempt of Japanese administration, and inciting Koreans against the tolerance of such administration, has clearly brought himself within the terms of the Order in Council, and has published "matter calculated to excite enmity between the Government of Korea and its subjects."

If this view be upheld, the fresh legislation suggested by Mr. Cockburn would seem unnecessary, and in any case Sir E. Grey would be reluctant to agree to such a course, as it would be obvious that the measure was taken ad hoc and ex post facto, and it might therefore be considered to have a somewhat vindictive appearance.

I am to request that you will take these papers into your consideration, and that you will be so good as to favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion whether proceedings could, with reasonable prospect of success, be taken under the Orders in Council of 1904 and 1907 in a proper case, or whether an amending Order would have to be issued as suggested by Mr. Cockburn. Sir E. Grey will be glad to be favoured at the same time with any other general observations that may occur to you as likely to assist him in dealing with the case. It will be seen from the last telegram received from Mr. Cockburn (paper (L)) on the subject that the Japanese Government are desirous to have the matter settled as soon as possible, and I am to request that the matter may therefore be treated as one of urgency, so that instructions can be telegraphed at an early date to Mr. Cockburn.

If it would, in your opinion, be likely to facilitate or expedite matters, and if you deem it advisable, Sir E. Grey will be happy to depute Mr. Kenrick, Acting Assistant Legal Adviser in this Department, to see His Majesty's Attorney-General and discuss this matter with him.

I have, &c.

Report.

Without any opportunity of perusing the articles in question, it is impossible to express a definite opinion as to whether or not their publication would constitute an offence under the Orders in Council of 1904 and 1907. We think, however, that the provisions of the Orders referred to make fairly clear the principles to be applied in considering whether or not Mr. Bethell's articles contravene the law.

Under Article 75 of the Order of 1904, the article must not be such as would excite tumult and disorder. Whether or not they have that character depends not merely on the sort of language used, but also on the character of the population to which it is addressed, and the general circumstances of the time. Language that might in England be quite properly employed by way of political propaganda without any danger to the public peace might have a different effect in Corea, and an Englishman editing newspapers in Corea must regulate the tone of such papers not by reference to what would be permissible in England, but to what would be safe under all the circumstances in Corea. Under the same provision (Article 75 of the Order of 1904) the articles must not be such as would be calculated to excite enmity between the Government of Corea and its subjects. This provision must be considered in the light of the Agreement between the Governments of Japan and Corea, by which the actual responsibility of executive and legislative Government rests ultimately with Japan, under whose guidance the Korean authorities must now act. Any attempt, therefore, to excite enmity among Koreans against the Japanese in relation to their policy or position in Corea may be construed as an attempt to excite enmity against the Government of Corea.

The Order appears intended to give effect to the reasonable principle that foreigners enjoying the privilege of a special jurisdiction exempting them from local laws shall not embarrass the local Government by propaganda which may be productive of discontent or disorder among the natives of the State.

The observations above made in reference to Article 75 of the Order of 1904 apply also to Article 83 of the same Order.

COREA.—EGYPT.

The Order of 1907 does not seem to make any substantial advance upon the Order of 1904. That Order makes it an offence to excite enmity between British subjects and the authorities, or subjects of any Power in amity with His Majesty; but a very different measure would be applied in considering articles addressed to British subjects as compared with articles addressed to Koreans. Proceedings may be taken under either Order which is in force at the time of the offence.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, December 11, 1906.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to state that a question has recently arisen in Egypt as to the method in which offences committed by natives against members of the Army of Occupation should for the future be dealt with.

Under a Khedivial Decree, dated the 25th February, 1895, it is provided that a Special Tribunal may, at the instance of the General Officer Commanding the Army of Occupation, supported by the British Agent and Consul-General, be instituted to take cognizance of crimes and offences committed by natives against soldiers and officers of the Army of Occupation or against sailors of British ships of war stationed in any Egyptian port. This Tribunal is presided over by the Egyptian Minister of Justice, and the following officials are members of it:—

1. The Judicial Adviser to the Government of Egypt;
2. An English Judge of the Native Court of Appeal;
3. The officiating Judge Advocate of the Army of Occupation at Cairo or Alexandria; and
4. The President of the Native Tribunal at Cairo or the Native Tribunal at Alexandria.

The Articles of the Khedivial Decree explain the procedure to be adopted by the Special Tribunal, and define its powers.

The last occasion on which this Special Tribunal was called into existence was in June this year, when certain British officers of the Army of Occupation were attacked whilst shooting pigeons by the inhabitants of the village of Denshawai. One officer died from the effects of the wounds he received, while several others were severely handled by the villagers, and received wounds of a more or less serious nature.

During the subsequent proceedings before the Special Tribunal certain defects in the law were brought to the notice of His Majesty's Government, and they considered it necessary to devise some new system, which could be substituted for that at present in force.

With this object in view, proposals have been put forward by His Majesty's Agent and Consul-General in Cairo in a despatch of which a copy is inclosed herewith (Inclosure (A)), and His Majesty's Government are now considering Lord Cromer's suggestions, which entail, briefly, the substitution of a Military Court for the Special Tribunal provided for under the Khedivial Decree of 1895.

In this connection, I am also to transmit to you herewith (Inclosure (B)) a copy of a private letter from Lord Cromer addressed to Sir Edward Grey.

From the Report given by His Majesty's then Law Officers on the 16th August, 1883 (Inclosure (C)), in connection with the arrest of a Maltese British subject by the French military authorities at Tunis for an offence committed against an officer of the French Army of Occupation, it is gathered that they considered that the right of an Army of Occupation to try by means of a Military Tribunal, with certain exceptions, offences committed against its members was generally recognized as a principle of international law, and I am accordingly to inquire, before proceeding further with the question, whether you concur in the opinion given in 1883, and, if not, in what respects you would desire to dissent from or to modify the views expressed by your predecessors in the Report in question.

I have, &c.

Report.

We concur with the Report given by our predecessors in 1883.

We observe, however, in that Opinion it is said that if the occupation of Tunis by the French amounted to a permanent Protectorate, and the army was stationed there in support of such Protectorate, and Civil Courts had been established by the French Government, it might well be contended that the army had ceased to be an Army of Occupation in a foreign country within the ordinary sense of those terms. It may be said that, except as to the establishment of Civil Courts by England, the remarks just quoted would apply to the present situation in Egypt, and that therefore the then Law Officers would not, on the principles laid down by them, be disposed to treat the English army now in Egypt as an Army of Occupation in a foreign country.

We doubt, however, whether that inference can be fairly drawn from their Opinion, and, in any event, we think that the British army in Egypt, notwithstanding the permanent character of its occupation, ought still to be treated according to the principles of international law applicable to an Army of Occupation.

Perhaps the best parallel case is that of the occupation by the French of the Papal States prior to 1870. That occupation lasted for many years, and was clearly assumed to be of a permanent character, or at least to be intended to last so long as the general political situation then existing was likely to last, but, so far as offences against French soldiers were concerned, no distinction was made between their occupation and that of an army in a hostile State.

We think therefore that, according to acknowledged principles of international law, the British Government is entitled to constitute Military Tribunals to deal with attacks or offences affecting the safety or position of British soldiers in Egypt. Having regard, however, to the undoubtedly permanent character of the British occupation, it is desirable that every practical safeguard should be adopted to prevent such Tribunals from acting in excess of their jurisdiction.

We agree with the Opinion of our predecessors, that the jurisdiction in question should not be extended to the case of an offence against an individual member of the army, which arises merely out of some quarrel, and cannot properly be regarded as directed against him in his capacity as a soldier; but we think this distinction cannot be worked in practice except by intrusting some official with the duty of deciding, according to his own discretion, whether or not the case is one proper to be tried by the Military Tribunal.

We think therefore it should be left, as Lord Cromer suggests, to the British Diplomatic Agent to say, with regard to each case, whether it is within the jurisdiction of the army or should be dealt with by a Civil Court. The sentences should also be subject to the approval of a superior military authority and of the Secretary of State, or some other high civilian authority.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, December 27, 1906.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit to you herewith the papers noted in the accompanying list which relate to the case of a French citizen named Gaston Thiriot, who was surrendered in extradition to France in July 1905, and who it is alleged has been tried and condemned for an offence other than that in respect of which his extradition was granted.

Thiriot was committed by the Presiding Magistrate at Bow Street Police Court on the 6th July, 1905, to await his surrender on the charge of being accessory after the fact to murder ("complicité d'assassinat"), his accomplice, Jean Baptiste Sauzat, being at the same time committed on the charge of murder and robbery ("assassinat et vol").

In May last, a communication was received from Mr. J. Davis, Solicitor, acting on behalf of Thiriot, alleging that at his trial on the 28th March, 1906, the accused had been sentenced to ten years' imprisonment on the charge of receiving, a charge on which his extradition had not been granted by His Majesty's Government (Paper A).

With the concurrence of His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department, His Majesty's Ambassador was instructed on the 8th June last to bring the case to the notice of the French Government, and, should the statements made by Mr. Davis prove to be well founded, to point out to them that the trial and condemnation of Thiriot upon the further charge of receiving constituted an infraction of the Extradition Treaty between the two countries.

On the 24th July last Sir F. Bertie forwarded the reply of the French Minister for Foreign Affairs (Paper C). In this reply it is contended that Thiriot was not found guilty of any crime other than that in respect of which he had been surrendered, the note adding, "il a été inculpé de complicité par recel de titres obtenus à l'aide d'un assassinat suivi de vol."

The French Government further argue that no objection to the charge was raised by the accused at the trial, and that, moreover, his counsel had stated in the course of his defence, that he had no intention of taking advantage of the terms of the Extradition Treaty.

It is, however, open to very great doubt whether the statement made by Thiriot's counsel relieves the French Government of their obligations under Article IV of the Treaty. A similar question arose in connection with the case of Emile Arton, a French citizen, who was surrendered in extradition to France in 1896. The Legal Adviser to this Department was then decidedly of opinion that Arton could not, in so far only as they concerned himself, waive the stipulations of an international arrangement, and that this could only be done by mutual agreement between the High Contracting Parties thereto. Subsequently the matter was referred to the then Law Officers of the Crown, and I am to invite your attention to a Report furnished by them to the Home Office on the 25th November of that year (Paper D), in which the opinion is expressed that, as a matter of principle, an individual cannot waive the stipulations of a Treaty.

In the present case two questions were put to the jury at the trial:—

1. Is Thiriot guilty of having knowingly received the whole or a portion of the property stolen from the murdered person?
2. Was Thiriot when he received the property aware that the crime of murder had been committed at the time when it was stolen?

To the first question the jury replied in the affirmative, to the second in the negative.

The reply of the French Government was duly communicated to Mr. Davis, but he has since urged that further representations to the French Government in the matter should be made, and traverses the arguments contained in the note above referred to (Paper E).

Gaston Thiriot. As to offence for which tried being that for which he was extradited

His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department has, however, consulted Mr. Marsham, the Metropolitan Police Magistrate at Bow Street who dealt with the case, and I am to invite your especial attention to the copy of his letter inclosed in the letter from the Home Office of the 10th October last (Paper F). It will be seen that Mr. Marsham considers that Thiriot was substantially tried and sentenced for the offence proved by the facts on which his surrender was granted, and sees no sufficient grounds for further representation to the French Government. You will, however, observe that, although His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department, in forwarding Mr. Marsham's letter, cites the judgment in the case ex parte Piot (15 Cox, C.C., 208), in which it was ruled that, with regard to the interpretation to be placed upon section 3 (2) of "The Extradition Act, 1870," it is not the warrant but the depositions which must be looked to in order to ascertain the nature of the offence or crime, yet he hesitates to take the view that Thiriot's conviction on the charge of receiving the stolen property was within the provisions of the Extradition Act and Treaty. Copies of the latter are inclosed (Papers H and I).

I am accordingly to request that you will take the inclosed papers into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion:—

1. Whether the trial and conviction of Thiriot upon the charge of receiving stolen property goes beyond the terms on which his surrender in extradition from this country was granted.

2. Whether there are in your opinion sufficient reasons to warrant His Majesty's Government in addressing a further representation to the French Government, and, if so, on what grounds such further representation could most advantageously be based.

3. Sir E. Grey would also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general character which you may desire to offer upon the papers now submitted to you.

1. In our opinion, the trial and conviction of Thiriot upon the charge of receiving stolen property does not go beyond the terms on which his surrender in extradition was granted. He was tried for the crime specified in the Magistrate's warrant, and, though not convicted of that crime, he was convicted of another extradition crime, proved by the facts on which his surrender was grounded, and, having regard to the provisions of section 19 of "The Extradition Act, 1870," we do not think that this country could successfully insist upon the narrow construction of Article IV of the Treaty of 1876 suggested by Thiriot's advisers.

2. In view of the above answer this question does not arise.

It will be seen that as a matter of fact the vessels in question were released on the recommendation of the Board of Trade, but it is considered desirable to ascertain whether the arrest was justifiable in the first instance. This must, in Sir E. Grey's opinion, depend on whether the waters surrounding the Eddystone can be regarded as part of the territorial waters of this country.

A somewhat analogous case is that of the British schooner "Admired," which was seized by an American revenue cutter within 3 miles of the rock or cay upon which the lighthouse known as the Fowey Light was erected, and was condemned by the United States' authorities at Key West. On the 5th March, 1889, the then Law Officers of the Crown, Sir Richard Webster, Attorney-General, and Sir Edward Clarke, Solicitor-General, were asked for their opinion as to whether the exclusive maritime jurisdiction of the United States within a radius of 3 miles from the Fowey Rock might safely be admitted, and on the 2nd April (Law Officers' Report, 1889, No. 59, pp. 114-116) they reported that, in the existing state of their information as to the character of the Fowey Rock, and the neighbouring rocks and reefs, they could not advise the admission that the territorial jurisdiction of the United States extends 3 miles seawards of that rock. It appeared, however, that in any case the "Admired" had been captured within 3 miles of the coast line of the Cay of Biscayne, which would bring her clearly within the jurisdiction of the United States, and they saw no ground for any further representation on behalf of the claimants. No further action was therefore taken in the matter by His Majesty's Government, and the question as to the waters round the lighthouse remained unsettled.

A copy of the Report of the Law Officers (Paper B) is annexed.

Sir Edward Grey understands that the Eddystone Lighthouse is a permanent stone structure, inhabited by the lighthouse keepers, that it is built upon a rock which is not permanently above high water, and that the rock cannot in the circumstances be regarded as being per se an island.

The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty are of opinion that the waters surrounding the lighthouse are part of the territorial waters of this country. The Assistant Legal Adviser to this Department, in a Minute on the Admiralty letter of the 2nd September, 1905, expressed the same view, the grounds on which he based his conclusion being that the limits of territorial waters must be drawn from the low water mark at any particular moment, and that if low water mark advances or recedes, the limits of territorial waters move with it, and this being so it appears to be immaterial whether the cause of the change of position in the low water mark is natural or artificial, or whether the artificial creation is, as for instance in the case of a pier, annexed to the mainland or detached from it as in the case of an outlying breakwater or a lighthouse.

If this view can be upheld, it appears to Sir Edward Grey that the waters surrounding the Eddystone are territorial for all purposes.

On the other hand, it seems open to contention that the mere erection of a lighthouse on an island or rock situated outside the ordinary limits of British territorial waters is not per se sufficient to constitute of necessity a claim to British sovereignty and jurisdiction over such island or rock. Moreover, the primary object of the occupation may well be looked to. In the case of a lighthouse erected on a dangerous semi-submerged rock well away from land in the fairway of the great shipping routes in the British Channel, its main object is the protection of the peaceful commerce and shipping of British and other nations frequenting these routes. This end can be attained without the assertion of sovereignty or jurisdiction over the rock itself, on which, however, it is natural that Great Britain, as the nation of all others most interested, should take upon herself the erection and maintenance of the lighthouse.

The building of a fort on such a rock would, on the other hand, constitute a direct claim of sovereignty in the most definite form, which could not possibly be disputed.

It may, indeed, be contended that the theory that occupation of territory is effective where such occupation is for the purpose of a lighthouse only is not one which it is to the interest of this country to uphold, since it might lead to the abandonment of the well-established principle of the inviolability of lighthouses, and to the consequent destruction of the Eddystone Lighthouse by an enemy in time of war, and I am to transmit to you copy of a letter from the Board of Trade, drawing attention to this side of the question, and inclosing copies of correspondence which passed in 1895 and 1897 between the Board of Trade, Trinity House, and the Admiralty, on the cognate subject of the connection of the Eddystone Lighthouse with the mainland, by means of an electric cable and the use of the lighthouse as a signalling station.

Again, assuming for the moment that it is to be held that by the erection of a lighthouse sovereignty and jurisdiction over an island or rock hitherto terra nullius are of necessity conferred, it yet seems open to grave doubt whether the rights of fishery in the territorial waters surrounding such rock which have hitherto been uninterrupted and continuously enjoyed by the fishermen of all nations can be extinguished ipso facto of the erection of the lighthouse.

I am to request that you will be good enough to take the matter into consideration and favour Sir Edward Grey with your opinion as to (1) whether by the erection of a permanent lighthouse on the Eddystone Rock Great Britain obtained sovereignty and jurisdiction over that rock, to any and if so to what extent, and (2) if the answer to the previous question should be in the affirmative, whether territorial jurisdiction can be claimed over the waters within a radius of 3 miles from the Eddystone Lighthouse for all, or any, and if so, what purposes.

Sir E. Grey would at the same time be glad to receive such observations of a general nature as you may be kind enough to offer for his guidance.

1. We are of opinion the proper inference to be drawn from the facts relating to the erection and maintenance of the Eddystone Lighthouse is that Great Britain intended to assert sovereignty and jurisdiction over the rock, and we think that there is no principle of international law to prevent such intention from becoming effective, with the consequence that the Eddystone becomes part of the British dominions.

2. We think that if His Majesty's Government thought fit as a matter of policy to claim territorial jurisdiction over the waters within a radius of 3 miles from the Eddystone Rock, they could do so consistently with the general principles of international law, but the circumstances of the case appear to us to render it inadvisable to assert such a claim. The occupation of the rock has always been of a limited and special character, and although it involves a claim of sovereignty, this country has always been careful not to assert that claim so far as to expose the lighthouse to risk in time of war. Any advantage that might arise from the exclusive fishery seems wholly disproportionate to such a risk. It would, moreover, give rise to disputable questions founded on the uninterrupted exercise of the right of fishing by the French in the immediate neighbourhood of the rock.

The reasons which moved the Admiralty to refrain from using the rock as a signalling station appear to apply with equal force to the question of asserting unqualified sovereignty up to the 3 mile limit.

No. 13.

[February 14, 1907.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, December 10, 1906.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to transmit to you herewith various papers, as noted in the accompanying list, relating to the status in countries where His Majesty exercises extra-territorial jurisdiction of persons born out of wedlock but legitimated by the subsequent marriage of their parents. Cases of this kind arise from time to time where the father has preserved a Scottish or Maltese domicile, and, in the absence of some authoritative pronouncement on the subject, prove exceedingly difficult to deal with in practice.

The first case to which your attention is directed consists of an application (Paper A) transmitted by the Consul at Foochow made by a British subject named William Thom, who is of Scottish origin and who has preserved a Scottish domicile, for the registration in the birth register of British subjects of the births of his four children by a Chinese woman with whom he cohabited and whom he subsequently married.

Sir E. Grey is advised that this application should be refused. It was decided by the House of Lords in the case of Shedden v. Patrick (1 Macqueen 535) that the subsequent marriage of the parents of an illegitimate child born abroad of a father who has preserved throughout his Scottish domicile of origin and his British nationality does not confer on such child the national status of a British subject, even though it render him legitimate in contemplation of Scottish law, and also in contemplation of English law for nearly every purpose.

The registration of the births of British subjects abroad is controlled by the Secretary of State under section 11 of "The Naturalization Act, 1870," and Sir E. Grey is advised that the registration there provided for cannot extend to persons who are aliens in contemplation of English law.

Subject to your concurrence, therefore, he proposes to instruct Consul Brady to refuse to register the births of Mr. Thom's children.

The further question arises, however, whether there is anything to prevent the children in question being regarded as subject to British jurisdiction in China and as entitled to British protection, and from being registered if their father desires it in the register of British subjects and protected persons—which register is of course quite separate and distinct from the birth register kept by His Majesty's Consular officers of the births of British subjects within their respective districts.

The extra-territorial rights of this country in China depend on the XVth, XVIth, and XVIIth Articles of the Treaty of Tien-tsin (Paper B), in all of which the words used are "British subjects." These Articles have never been construed as applying only to those who are British subjects in the strict and limited sense of the term, i.e., to such persons only as would, for instance, in this country be entitled to exercise the parliamentary franchise or to own a British ship. It has always been interpreted as applying to all British-protected persons; such an interpretation is in accordance with the tenour of "The China and Corea Order in Council, 1904" (Paper C), where "British subject" is defined to include British-protected person, nor has it ever been contested by the Chinese Government.

There is no exhaustive definition of the words "British-protected person"; by Statute it includes all subjects of the native States in India (53 & 54 Vict., cap. 37, sec. 15), and by usage it covers all the inhabitants of British Protectorates and other territories which are technically not part of the "British dominions," though in substance they are to be regarded as appanages of the British Empire.

In reality the term "British-protected person" covers every one who, with the sanction of the Secretary of State, enjoys British protection; and the limitations on the power of the Secretary of State to grant British protection are imposed, not by the legislative enactments of Parliament, but by international comity, and, in extra-territorial jurisdiction, by the terms of the Treaty or Capitulation under which that jurisdiction is exercised.

extra-ter-

persons

William Thom and Vincenzo
Grech.

Where the children of a British subject are legitimated per subsequens matrimonium and are not claimed as subjects of the local Sovereign, Sir E. Grey sees no reason why British protection should not be accorded to them, and their names inserted in the register, if this can legally be done.

The second case (Papers D, E, F, G) is an application transmitted through the Consul-General at Constantinople for the registration in the register of British subjects (which includes British-protected persons) of the children of the late Vincenzo Grech, a British subject of Maltese origin, who were born out of wedlock, but who were legitimated, in contemplation of the law of Malta, the parental domicile, by the subsequent marriage of the parents. They are not claimed as Ottoman subjects.

The Capitulations (Paper H) under which British jurisdiction is exercised in Turkey are dated 1675, and use only the terms "Englishman" or "the English": their language does not in any way limit the privileges conferred to those who are British subjects in the technical sense.

The question whether these persons should be registered raises the same considerations as the case of Thom above.

I have the honour to request you to take the papers into your consideration, and favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion:—

(1.) Whether the births of the children of Mr. Thom should be entered in the register of births of British subjects abroad;

(2.) Whether there is anything in the Treaty of Tien-tsin or in the municipal law of this country to prevent the Secretary of State from placing the children of Mr. Thom under British-protection and jurisdiction in China, and from causing their names to be inserted as British-protected persons in the register of British subjects;

(3.) Whether there is anything in the Capitulations or in the municipal law of this country to prevent the Secretary of State from placing the sons of the late Vincenzo Grech under British protection and jurisdiction in the Ottoman Empire, and from causing their names to be inserted as British-protected persons in the register of British subjects.

The Secretary of State would also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer.

Report.

In our opinion the children of Mr. Thom (other than Jessie, who is a British subject by reason of her birth in British territory) are not British subjects, and that therefore their births should not be entered in the register of births of British subjects abroad.

(2.) We think that there is nothing in the Treaty of Tien-tsin (on the construction which it is stated in Sir Eric Barrington's letter to have received) or in the municipal law of this country to prevent the Secretary of State from placing the children of Mr. Thom (other than Jessie) under British protection and jurisdiction in China, and from causing their names to be inserted as British-protected persons in the register of British subjects. We may observe, however, that William, who was born at Macao, might be claimed as a Portuguese subject, and James Alexander and Georgina, who were born in China, might be claimed as Chinese subjects, and that the question whether such children should be treated as British-protected persons seems to be one of policy rather than of law.

3. We think that there is nothing in the Capitulations or in the municipal law of this country to prevent the Secretary of State from placing the sons of the late Vincenzo Grech under British protection and jurisdiction in the Ottoman Empire, and from causing their names to be inserted as British-protected persons in the register of British subjects. We observe, however, that it is suggested in the despatch of Mr. Consul-General Eyre, dated the 11th January, 1906, in a statement of considerable obscurity, that the marriage of the late Vincenzo Grech would not have, under the circumstances, the operation in Maltese law of legitimizing his sons. We do not advise that effect should be given to this suggestion.

Trawling in the Moray Firth.

Memorandum by the Lord Chancellor.

FROM the point of view of international law, I think it is quite clear that a British Act of Parliament cannot, as against any foreign vessel, affect the right of fishing in the high seas, though of course it is binding on British subjects. Also, British ships of war or fishery-ships have no right to board foreign vessels on the high seas for the purpose of ascertaining the names and nationality of the crews. If the Norwegian Government have agreed to this, of course it may be done without impropriety. I do not see any statement that they have so agreed, and certainly the fact that they warn their own people to refrain from trawling in the Moray Firth is a very different thing from sanctioning the boarding of their vessels by British authorities. I cannot help thinking that the entire policy of this Act was wrong, and though the Court of Session has decided that in terms it applied to foreigners, yet that it cannot in practice be applied to foreigners outside territorial waters without a grave breach of international law. The Scottish authorities have renounced prosecutions against foreigners. It seems to me, as at present advised, that they are equally bound to renounce the practice of boarding or any other interference with foreigners, unless it is done with the express consent of the foreign Government, as in the case of the Behring Sea Convention between Great Britain and the United States of America. It is by agreement alone that foreign ships can be touched on the high seas, and I think no nation has nearly so great an interest as Great Britain has in maintaining this rule inviolate. I think the same of the rule which allows fishing outside the 3-mile limit.

WE were honoured by your Lordship's commands, signified to us by Mr. Bertram Cox in his letter of the 14th May last, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us, for our consideration, copy of a draft Order, which it was proposed to submit to His Majesty in Council, to suspend the operation of the Imperial Extradition Acts in Canada, so long as the Extradition Act, which had now become Part I of the chapter 155 of "The Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906," should continue in force, and to inquire whether the terms of the draft were sufficient and proper for the purpose intended.

Draft Order in Council.

WHEREAS, by the Extradition Acts 1870 to 1906 it is, among other things, enacted that, if by any Law or Ordinance made after the passing of the Act of 1870 by the Legislature of any British possession, provision is made for carrying into effect within such possession the surrender of fugitive criminals who are in, or suspected of being in, such British possession, His Majesty may, by the Order in Council applying the said Acts, in the case of any foreign State, or by any subsequent Order, suspend the operation within any such British possession of the said Acts, or any part thereof, so far as it relates to such foreign State, and so long as such Law or Ordinance continues in force there, and no longer;

And whereas, by Part I of chapter 155 of "The Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906," being an Act of the Parliament of Canada intituled "An Act respecting the Extradition of Criminals," provision is made for carrying into effect within the Dominion the surrender of fugitive criminals;

Now, therefore, His Majesty, by and with the advice of His Privy Council, and in virtue of the authority committed to him by the said recited Acts, doth order, and it is hereby ordered, that the operation of the Extradition Acts, 1870 to 1906, shall be suspended within the Dominion of Canada so long as Part I of chapter 155 of "The Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906," shall continue in force, and no longer."

Treaties
with Australian Colonies previous to Constitution of Commonwealth.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified to us in Mr. Bertram Cox's letter of the 26th June last, stating that he was directed to request that we would be so good as to favour your Lordship with our opinion on certain points which had arisen in connection with the effect of the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia on Treaties to which the Australian States had adhered before confederation, and on the right of the States to adhere to future Treaties.

That our predecessors in Reports of the 11th March and the 16th April, 1902, advised that, despite the constitution of the Commonwealth, the Treaty with Japan of the 16th July, 1894, was still binding on the State of Queensland, which had adhered to it before confederation. That our predecessors had before them the fact that the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth had advised that the Treaty had been terminated by the entry of Queensland into the Commonwealth, but that the grounds on which Mr. Deakin based that opinion were not then known to the Colonial Office. That during his recent visit to this country Mr. Deakin supplied a copy of the reasons for his opinion, and also a copy of an opinion of the present Attorney-General dealing with the same matter. That it would be seen that the view held by Mr. Deakin rested on the analogy of the entrance of Sovereign States into a confederation, and that while your Lordship was advised that there was a considerable body of opinion to the effect that on the entrance of a State into a confederation all Treaties—or at least all Treaties which conflicted in any way with the confederation—ipso facto terminated. That your Lordship entertained considerable doubt whether this argument had any application to the case of the federation of a group of Colonies. That, as pointed out by our predecessors, Treaties were made by His Majesty on behalf of his dominions, and the mere change of the internal administration of portions of those dominions could hardly be put forward as a valid reason for holding that a Treaty entered into on behalf of part of those dominions terminated on confederation.

That at the same time there arose the question whether, when Treaties were concluded in future with foreign Powers, adherence must be made, if at all, on behalf of the Commonwealth as a whole, or whether any State might adhere separately. That our predecessors, in a Report of the 11th July, 1901, advised that the Dominion of Canada could only adhere to the Convention between the United Kingdom and the United States of America relative to the disposal of real and personal property on the terms of New Brunswick being bound by it as well as the other provinces, from which it would appear that in their view no province of the Dominion could adhere separately to a Treaty. That that Report, however, was not conclusive for the case of the Australian States, since the terms of confederation were in the case of Canada and Australia somewhat different. That in the case of Canada the Dominion Parliament was empowered by section 132 of "The British North America Act, 1867," to perform the obligations of Canada or of any province arising under Treaties, so that the provinces had clearly no right to contract Treaty obligations which were matters for the Dominion. That the Australian Constitution had no such provision although the Commonwealth Parliament had, inter alia, power to legislate regarding external affairs (section 51 (XXIX) of Constitution Act, 1900), but that that power was apparently merely shared with the States, though a Commonwealth law could override a State law.

That in those cases in which the Commonwealth had paramount legislative authority, whether exclusive or concurrent, your Lordship would suggest that adhesion to Treaties should be notified on behalf of the Commonwealth and on the advice of the Commonwealth Government alone. That the Commonwealth was constituted in order to enable Australia to act as one body in matters of external interest, and that your Lordship could see no reason for consulting the State Governments in any instance in which the Commonwealth Government was in a position on its own authority to make good any obligation which it undertook.

That there were, on the other hand, certain cases in which the Commonwealth had no legislative power. That His Majesty's Government, for instance, had recently entered into Conventions for the regulation of night labour of women and for the unification of the pharmacopoeial formula for potent drugs, under both of which any Colony or Possession of His Majesty's Government could adhere separately to the Conventions. That the necessary steps to carry out the terms of these Conventions would, your Lordship was advised, have to be taken by the State Governments and Parliaments, and that an adhesion on the part of the Commonwealth would involve it in obligations which, without the consent of the States, it could not perform.

That it would appear, therefore, that any adhesion to those Conventions would have to be based on the consent of the Government of the State, and should be made, in accordance with the Report of our predecessors of the 11th March, 1902, by His Majesty's Government on behalf of the Government of the Commonwealth and of the Government of the State concerned, and that the consent of both the Commonwealth and of the State Government would be requisite. That there still remained, however, the question whether all the States must adhere to such Conventions or whether one or more might adhere.

GENERAL.—GERMANY.

That Mr. Bertram Cox was accordingly to request us to take this matter into our consideration and to report—

1. Whether Treaties to which States of the Commonwealth of Australia had adhered before confederation were still binding on the Commonwealth in respect of the State concerned, notwithstanding the confederation of the States?

2. Whether in cases of Treaties whose subject-matter fell within the legislative competence of the Commonwealth, adhesion should be notified on behalf of the Commonwealth, and on the advice of the Commonwealth Government, without reference to the State; or, if not, in what other manner?

3. Whether in cases of Treaties whose subject-matter fell within the exclusive legislative competence of the State, adhesion should be notified on behalf of the Commonwealth Government and of the States, and on the advice of both Governments; or, if not, what procedure should be adopted?

4. Whether it was possible for adhesion to be signified on behalf of one or more States only, in cases where all the States were not prepared to adhere.

We have taken the papers into our consideration, and, in obedience to your Lordship's commands, have the honour to

Report—

1. That, in our opinion, Treaties to which States of the Commonwealth adhered before confederation are still binding on the Commonwealth in respect of the State concerned.

2. In cases of Treaties whose subject-matter falls within the legislative competence of the Commonwealth, adhesion should be notified on behalf of the Commonwealth, and on the advice of the Commonwealth Government, without reference to the States.

3. In cases of Treaties whose subject-matter falls within the exclusive legislative competence of the States, adhesion should be notified on behalf of the Commonwealth Government on the advice of both Governments.

Rebellion in German
South-West Africa: In-ternments in Cape Colony;
Orange River Ferry.

WE were honoured by your Lordship's commands, signified to us by Mr. Just in his letter of the 15th January last, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to request us to be good enough to favour you with our opinion upon certain questions of international law which have arisen in connection with the rebellion of the Hottentot and other native inhabitants of the Protectorate of German South-West Africa.

That it would be seen from the paper marked (A) that considerable expense had been caused to the Government of Cape Colony by the numbers of rebels who had been driven over the British-German frontier between the Cape Colony and the German South-West Africa Protectorate by the German forces, and who, at the instance of the German Government, had been disarmed and "interned" at a distance from the frontier sufficiently remote to prevent them again troubling the Protectorate from which they had fled.

That the Cape Government had repeatedly pressed the German Government to defray the expenditure thus incurred, but that they had hitherto been unable to obtain any refund of the expenses to which they had been put, the German Government confining themselves to remarking that they would be ready to look after the refugees if these latter were sent back.

That the Cape Government, finding all their applications fruitless, were very anxious to obtain satisfaction for their claims by threatening the Germans that if their claims were not met by a certain date they would—

1. Release the refugees from the camps in which they were at present "interned"; and

2. Forbid the passage of stores, &c., across the British-German frontier.

That with regard to No. 1 he was to observe that it appeared more than doubtful whether the Cape Government had not throughout been acting ultra vires in interning the refugees at all.

That the process of internment was one which would appear to be appropriate and to be recognized by international law and usage only when regular hostilities were going on, and military forces of one of the belligerents were obliged to take refuge from those of the other in the territories of a neighbouring neutral, who then "interned" them until the termination of hostilities.

That the process was one, therefore, to which it would seem difficult properly in the present instance to have recourse, since there was no question but that the natives to whom it had been applied were not invested with any belligerent character; that, indeed, they partook rather of the character of political refugees who had sought asylum in British soil. That, if this view were correct, the question seemed to be not so much whether the Cape Government were justified in not releasing the refugees as whether in continuing to keep them "interned" they would not be merely prolonging an illegal situation which ought never to have been created.

That, with regard to the second step with which the Cape Government proposed to threaten the German Government in the hope of thereby compelling these latter to meet their claims, he was to remark that throughout the course of the military operations which had now been going on for some years in German South-West Africa the Cape Government had consistently refused to open to traffic more than one drift in the whole length of the frontier, which was of many hundred miles, on account of the difficulty and expense of controlling traffic at these distant points, and have always declined to permit the passage of any warlike stores even by that one drift; that their reason had been that they were not prepared to allow British territory to be used by the German authorities as a base of operations, because of the possibility of trouble being thereby created with their own natives, who were nearly connected by ties of race with the rebels in German South-West Africa. That from motives of humanity, however, they had allowed strictly limited amounts of provisions to be sent through for the use of the civil population under permits issued by the officers in command of the Cape Police at the drift. That the limitation, moreover, of these stores was not confined merely to quantity, but permission for their passage was only given from month to month.

That the German authorities accepted these restrictions without demur and applied or allowed their contractors to apply for permits on these terms. That, indeed, up to May 1905, the German Consul-General at Capetown was in the habit of certifying that all the supplies imported over the drift in question were for the use of the civil population in German South-West Africa.

That he was to request us to take the circumstances into our consideration and to favour your Lordship with our views as to—

1. Whether the action of the Cape Government in "interning" the refugees from German South-West Africa—such refugees not being belligerents—was in accordance with international law;

2. Whether, supposing the answer to this question to be in the affirmative, the Cape Government were under any obligation of international, as distinguished from municipal, law to "intern" the refugees, or were bound to keep them "interned" or otherwise to prevent them from returning to German South-West Africa should they wish to do so; and

3. Whether their action in the matter was legal or not, had the Cape Government any legal or equitable claim to be refunded their expenses at the hands of the German Government, at whose instance and request they incurred these expenses, it being remembered that the German Government had always expressed themselves as perfectly ready to receive the refugees if asylum in British territory were denied to them and they were forcibly handed over to the German authorities?

That there was a further point on which, though not directly connected with those above set forth, your Lordship would be glad to be furnished with our opinion, viz., the continued occupation by the Germans of the drift (i.e., Rahmansdrift) to which allusion has previously been made.

That the German Government admitted that the frontier between the British and German possessions in this neighbourhood was governed by section 1 of Article 3 of the Anglo-German Agreement of 1890, which provided that the line of demarcation should commence at the mouth of the Orange River and ascend the north bank of that river to the point of its intersection by the 20th degree of east longitude. That the German Government raised, indeed, questions as to the exact interpretation of the expression "north bank," but that they did not dispute that the whole bed of the river, as well also, of course, as the south bank, was British.

That all the same, however, they had given to one Sperlich a lease of the ferry at Rahmansdrift, which carried with it a landing monopoly on the northern bank of the Orange River extending 10 kilom. on either side of the Rahmansdrift landing place, and that, though constant remonstrances had been made to them on the subject, they had paid them no attention.

That in these circumstances your Lordship would be glad to be favoured with our views as to the steps which the Cape Government should take with a view to re-entering into possession of what appeared undoubtedly to be their property.

We have taken the matter into our consideration, and, in obedience to your Lordship's commands, have the honour to

Report—

That, 1 and 2, in our opinion the principles of international law relating to the duty of a neutral Power in regard to the internment of belligerent forces entering its territory do not apply in the present case. Nor is the Cape Government bound to send the refugees back, but if it gives them asylum and has ground to believe that they propose using the Cape territory as a base for hostile operations against a friendly Power they must take reasonable steps to prevent such a course being adopted. For this purpose, though not bound to intern, the Cape Government are entitled to do so if they think fit.

3. The Cape Government have no legal or equitable claim to have their expenses reimbursed by the German Government, unless they can show some express or clearly implied promise on the part of that Government to do so.

4. On the construction of Article 3 of the Anglo-German Agreement of July 1890, it would seem that the Orange River is within British territory and that no grant or reservation of the right of navigation is made to Germany. Having regard to this view, the Cape Government are entitled to forbid and, if necessary, to prevent the use of the Orange River, as well as of its south shore, by the German ferry.

We should, however, add that the assertion and exercise of such an exclusive right would involve serious questions of policy as well as of law.

We have, &c.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 13, 1907.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list, which relate to the steam-ships "Australia" and "Montara," the property of the Oceanic Steam-ship Company and the Pacific Coast Steam-ship Company respectively, which were chartered in March 1905 for a period of four months by the Kamchatka Commercial-Industrial Company, for the purpose of trading between San Francisco, the Sea of Okotsk, and Kamchatka, and their respective vicinities. The two vessels while employed in this trade were stopped and seized on the high seas by vessels of the Japanese navy, brought before Prize Courts and condemned, together with their cargoes.

The Kamchatka Company apparently hold a concession from the Russian Government, by the provisions of which the Company are bound inter alia to employ vessels flying the Russian flag for their trade. In time of peace this duty was performed by steamers of the Russian Volunteer fleet, but on the outbreak of war these vessels were taken up by the Russian Government for naval purposes, and within a short space of time there were no ships under the Russian flag available. The Company were in consequence compelled to charter the neutral vessels "Australia" and "Montara" to carry on the work.

By the terms of the charters it was stipulated in each case that the charterers were, at their own expense, to provide the owners with policies for fixed amounts against war risks. These policies were taken out in this country, and the underwriters, whose risks were the only English interests involved, have paid claims amounting to over 100,000*l.* in respect of the capture of the two vessels.

It will be seen from the letter addressed to the Secretary of State on the 15th ultimo by Messrs. Waltons, Johnson, and Co., who are acting on behalf of the underwriters, Paper (A), that the latter have brought these cases to the notice of the Secretary of State on the ground that this loss has been caused by a miscarriage of justice. A perusal of the judgments delivered by the Japanese Prize Courts shows that they are in the main based upon the same grounds, with this difference, that in the case of the "Australia" the judgment proceeds rather upon the assumption that the vessel had assumed an enemy character by the fact of her having been placed at the disposal of the Russian Government, and in the case of the "Montara," that the vessel had assumed an enemy character by the fact of her having been engaged in trading operations under a concession granted by the Russian Government.

I am to request that you will take these papers into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir Edward with your opinion—

1. Whether the circumstances of these cases or of either of them are such as to warrant His Majesty's Government in making representations to the Japanese Government on behalf of the underwriters.

2. If so, on what grounds such representations could most advantageously be based.

3. Sir Edward would also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general character which you may desire to offer upon the papers now submitted for your consideration.

Report.

In our opinion, the circumstances are not such as to warrant His Majesty's Government in making representations to the Japanese Government on behalf of the underwriters.

The trade in which the "Australia" and the "Montara" were engaged at the time of capture was a privileged Russian trade, i.e., a trade in which ordinarily only Russian ships were permitted to engage. The Russian law or concession establishing that privilege was maintained throughout the war, and any neutral vessels which might be permitted or licensed by the Russian Government to engage in the trade were at the disposal of that Government for the gratuitous carriage of its own officials and for various other purposes.

Such vessels assumed therefore the character of enemy vessels according to the long-established rule of our Courts, and we think it would be difficult to make any substantial complaint in respect of the judgment.

It does not appear in our instructions whether the facts found by the Prize Court were duly disclosed to the underwriters before the making of their policies. If they were so disclosed, the underwriters have no claim for consideration on His Majesty's Government; if they were not so disclosed, they were not bound to pay on their policies, which they have apparently done without raising this defence.

Cargoes of

contraband:
doctrine of pre-emption.

WITH reference to your Report of the 13th December, 1906, respecting the condemnation by the Japanese Prize Court of certain portions of the cargoes of the British vessels "Hsiping" and "Pehping," I have the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you the draft of a despatch which it is proposed to send to His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Tokiô (Paper (A)) instructing him to address a representation to the Japanese Government in the matter.

The draft has been prepared on the lines of your Report above referred to, and I am to request that you will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion whether, in the circumstances of the case, its terms are right and proper.

I am at the same time to explain, with regard to the question of pre-emption, that Sir E. Grey feels some hesitation as to whether it would be well to go beyond the statement that it would have been fairer on the part of the Japanese Government to subject the goods in question to pre-emption than to condemn them outright. No precedents can be discovered for representations addressed to a foreign State on the ground that goods ancipitis usus have not been subjected to pre-emption but have been condemned, and, although the archives of this Department have been searched, no records can be found which support a general contention that the principal foreign Maritime States advocate this practice. The Regulations respecting capture of prizes at sea issued by Denmark, Italy, Russia, the United States, and Japan make no reference to the point. I am, however, to state that if, in your opinion, it is possible to go beyond the words used in the draft, and specifically complain of the absence from the Japanese Regulations of any provisions on the subject of pre-emption, Sir E. Grey would be glad if you would make such additions thereto as may seem to you to be desirable.

A copy of your Report of the 13th December, 1906, together with the Papers therein mentioned, are also inclosed for convenience of reference (Papers (C), (D), (E), (F), (G), and (H)).

Report.

The view taken by us in our Report of the 12th December, 1906, as to the practice of pre-emption in cases of conditional contraband is the same as that laid down by Hall (Atlay's edition, 1904, p. 665), Phillimore (III, p. 450), Oppenheim (vol. ii, p. 443), and, as regards provisions, Kent's "Commentaries" (vol. i, p. 142). See also Owen on "Declaration of War," p. 244, under the heading of "Pre-emption," where he states that certain articles of an equivocal nature, chief among which are provisions, have sometimes been placed on an exceptional footing so as to become the subject of purchase instead of confiscation.

The principle as laid down by Hall is that, in strictness, every article which is either necessarily contraband or which has become so from the special circumstances of the war is liable to confiscation, but it is usual for those nations who vary their list of contraband to subject the better class (that is, conditional contraband) to pre-emption only, which by the English practice means purchase of the merchandize at its mercantile value.

In the case of the "Hsiping" and the "Pehping" the Japanese Prize Court has not explicitly found that all the food-stuffs in question were shown to be intended for use of the belligerent forces. It appears to have acted on the belief that the circumstances afforded a strong presumption that the food-stuffs were actually so intended. The case therefore seems one in which the practice of pre-emption is peculiarly appropriate, and it is perhaps unnecessary to raise the disputed proposition that, even if the food-stuffs had been in fact shown to be consigned to the enemy's forces, the right of pre-emption would nevertheless have existed. That proposition goes somewhat beyond the necessities of the present case. We therefore suggest the following alteration in the proposed despatch:—

After the paragraph stating that the rice was only found to be suitable for consumption by Russian troops, insert:—

"In any case His Majesty's Government consider that in these circumstances it would have been fairer to subject the food-stuffs seized to pre-emption than to condemn them outright. That is the practice of this country."

Annex.

Draft of Despatch from Sir Edward Grey to Mr. Lowther.

(No. . Treaty.)
Sir,

Foreign Office, February , 1907.

HIS Majesty's Government have had under their consideration, in communication with their legal advisers, Sir C. MacDonald's despatch No. 32, Treaty, of the 11th July, 1906, inclosing translations of the decisions of the Higher Prize Court in the case of the steam-ships "Hsiping" and "Pehping," in which certain portions of their cargoes, notably various shipments of rice for Newchwang, were condemned.

I have now to observe that, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, the decisions of the Court in these cases are in some respects at variance with the principles of international law. The Japanese Regulations relating to contraband recognize the distinction between absolute and conditional contraband, and so far they agree with the views maintained by this country, but the decisions of the Court deprive the distinction of any practical effect. The most important part of the judgment is that which confiscates the articles of food consigned to Newchwang, and it appears to His Majesty's Government that such confiscation, so far as it relates to food not intended for European consumption, is unjustifiable, because the facts in evidence relied upon by the captors did not show that such provisions were intended for the use of the Russian army, but rather supported the contrary inference. Particularly is this the case with the rice, as to which the Court did not even purport to find its destination, but only that it was suitable for consumption by Russian troops.

In the view of His Majesty's Government, even if the food-stuffs in question were shown to be intended for the use of the belligerent forces, it would have been fairer to subject them to pre-emption rather than to condemn them outright.

In any case, His Majesty's Government consider that, in these circumstances, it would have been fairer to subject the food-stuffs seized to pre-emption than to condemn them outright. That is the practice of this country.

The condemnation of the silver coins seems open to objection on the same grounds, namely, that their destination to the Russian army was not proved. The judgment as regards the iron wheels, iron tubes, old iron, iron ore, and timber referred to in Case No. 30 (Inclosure 2 in Sir C. MacDonald's despatch) does not find, as required by the Japanese Regulations, that such articles were intended solely for use in war, but only that they might be employed directly for warlike purposes. Such a finding appears to recognize that they are articles ancipitis usus, and therefore they should be treated only as conditionally contraband.

In this connexion, I have to observe that the wording, if not the substance, of the Japanese Regulations relating to conditional contraband appears to His Majesty's Government to be open to objection, inasmuch as a Prize Court may be thereby enabled to condemn without the necessity of finding definitely that articles only conditionally contraband are in fact intended for the use of enemy forces.

You should address a communication to the Japanese Government in the sense of the foregoing observations, and request that the cases of these two vessels may receive further consideration.

German steam-ship "Paros" seized for contraband by Japanese during war with Russia

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list relating to the seizure and condemnation by the Japanese authorities of the German steam-ship "Paros," owned by the "Aktiengesellschaft Deutsche Levante Linie" of Hamburg.

The "Paros," which had been chartered by Messrs. Kunst and Albers of Hamburg to carry a cargo of general merchandize from Hamburg to Vladivostock, sailed from the former port at the end of November 1904, was captured by the Japanese auxiliary cruiser "Hong Kong" off the Island of Hokkaido, and taken into Yokosuka for adjudication. The steamer and the whole of the cargo were condemned by the Port Prize Court, and this decision was subsequently confirmed on appeal by the Supreme Prize Court at Tôkiô.

The "Paros" and her cargo were insured against war risks by policies effected in London with British underwriters to the amount of 8,750*l.* on the steamer and 80,250*l.* on the cargo. These sums have been paid in full by the underwriters.

The main features of the case are very fully set forth in the inclosed "Statement of Facts" (Paper A) which has been prepared by Messrs. Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whetton, solicitors, acting on behalf of the Indemnity Mutual Marine Assurance Company, Limited, who have also furnished copies of the report of the master of the "Paros," of the list and description of the shipments constituting her cargo, of a translation of the judgment of the Supreme Prize Court, and of two charter-parties, made respectively on the 25th and 26th October, 1904, between (1) the "Deutsche Levante Line" and Messrs. Kunst and Albers, of Hamburg, and (2) the "Deutsche Levante Line" and Messrs. G. and J. E. Pinckernelle, ship-brokers, of Hamburg (Papers B, C, D, E, and F).

It would appear from these charter-parties that (1) if on the arrival of the "Paros" off Vladivostock the port should be blockaded or the vessel warned off by the Japanese, she was to proceed to Hong Kong and there discharge her cargo, and (2), if, on her arrival at Labuan, where she was to call for coal and orders, the charterers should consider it impossible for her to reach Vladivostock, she might be ordered to Hong Kong to unload. For fear of difficulties with the crew, and for other reasons set out in the "Statement of Facts," the first charter-party for Vladivostock, dated the 25th October, 1904, was kept secret, and the second entered into on the following day (26th October, 1904), by the terms of which the "Paros" was to proceed to Hong Kong, the bills of lading being also made out for the latter port.

These documents were found by the Japanese on board the steamer at the time of her seizure, 1,500 miles north of Hong Kong.

Both ship and cargo were condemned on the ground that part of the cargo was contraband; that the ship and the entire cargo belonged to the same parties, and that consequently the non-contraband cargo was liable to condemnation as being the property of the owner of the contraband, and the Court also relied on the circumstance that deceit was employed as to the ship's destination.

A deputation representing the British underwriters, and introduced by Mr. Rose, M.P., was received by Lord Fitzmaurice on the 21st October last, when his Lordship suggested that a "statement of facts" should be prepared by their legal advisers and forwarded to this Department, with a view to its submission to you for your consideration.

I am, therefore, to request that you will be so good as to take these papers into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir Edward Grey with your opinion—

Whether the circumstances of the case are such as to warrant His Majesty's Government in approaching the German Government with a view to ascertaining whether they would be disposed to take up the case, on behalf of the British underwriters, of this German vessel and cargo, and, in the event of their declining to do so, whether representations could properly be made by His Majesty's Government themselves to the Japanese Government, and, if so, on what grounds such representations could most advantageously be based.

Sir Edward would, at the same time, be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general character which you may desire to offer upon the papers now submitted to you.

I have, &c.
(Signed) F. A. CAMPBELL.

Statement of Facts.

THE "Paros" was a German steamer of 2,398 tons owned by the "Aktiengesellschaft Deutsche Levante Linie" of Hamburg. On the 25th October, 1904, she was chartered by Mr. Price of Kunst and Albers of Hamburg, at a lump sum freight, to carry a cargo of general merchandize from Hamburg to Vladivostock. The charter-party provided: (1) That if on arrival off Vladivostock that port should be blockaded, or the steamer warned off by enemies, she was to proceed to Hong Kong and discharge her cargo there, the freight in that case to be 9,800*l.*; (2) that if on arrival at Labuan (where she was to call for orders and coals) it should be found, or considered by the charterers, impossible for her to reach Vladivostock, the charterers might order her to Hong Kong for discharging—the freight in that case to be 5,600*l.*; (3) that if the steamer discharged at Vladivostock the freight was to be 11,200*l.* The charter-party prohibited the carriage of coals, ammunition, guns, arms, dynamite, gunpowder, and other explosives. The charter-party was made between the Deutsche Levante Line and Kunst and Albers through the intermediary of G. and J. E. Pinckernelle, ship-brokers at Hamburg.

Kunst and Albers are merchants who (as can be proved if necessary by the manifesto of steamers chartered by them in previous years) had from year to year been in the habit of sending similar mixed cargoes to Vladivostock to supply the needs of towns and villages in the country to which Vladivostock is the only port of entry; and the whole of the "Paros" cargo (consisting of upwards of eighty separate parcels of various goods) was intended for the purpose of this trade.

Japan has adhered to the Declaration of Paris, by which even enemy's goods, except contraband of war, are covered by the neutral flag, and it is submitted that no part of the "Paros" cargo came within the first class of contraband in the Japanese

The steamer and cargo were insured against war risks by policies effected in London with English underwriters to the extent of 8,750*l.* on the steamer and 80,250*l.* on the cargo.

The English underwriters have paid in full the above sums under the policies effected with them on steamer and cargo.

The intended destination of the "Paros" was Vladivostock, provided she was not prevented by blockade, &c., from getting there, but although she was not engaged for any contraband trade it was considered undesirable that her intended destination should be made known until her departure from Labuan (where she was to call for orders), one reason being that her ultimate destination was not to be definitely fixed until arrival at Labuan, and another being as the war between Russian and Japan was then pending the crew might have made difficulties about sailing to Vladivostock; therefore the intended destination and the charter-party of the 25th October, 1904, were kept secret, and another charter-party dated the 26th October, 1904, was made out by which it was purported that the "Paros" was chartered to G. and E. J. Pinckernelle (the brokers) for a voyage to Hong Kong at a lump sum freight of 2,800*l.* The bills of lading were also, for the same reason, made out to Hong Kong. It was, moreover, regarded as quite problematic whether the "Paros" would ever be able to reach Vladivostock and deliver her cargo there, having regard to the probability of a blockade of that port being declared; and if she did not, and had to discharge at Hong Kong, bills of lading for Hong Kong would have been essential, whereas if she had reached Vladivostock, delivery of the whole cargo would have been taken by KUNST and ALBER's regular representatives there, and therefore no bills of lading would have been necessary. This was an additional reason for the bills of lading being made out for Hong Kong and for a charter-party being prepared to correspond with them. Moreover, in the charter-party of the 25th October, it was stipulated that the bills of lading were to be made out by the charterers as they might think best.

From the translated judgment of the Superior Prize Court it would appear that the condemnation of the steamer and her entire cargo was based upon the following grounds:—

- As to (1) and (2), it is submitted that none of the cargo was either first class or second class contraband as declared in the Japanese Notification. Unless it be assumed, contrary to actual fact, that the cargo, or some part of it, was destined for the Russian army or navy, or that there was reason to believe it to be intended for the use of such army or navy, there was no justification whatever for treating any of it as contraband. The few bags of cement (most, or all of which had, previously to the capture, been used to stop leakage caused by ice), the twenty-five cases of linoleum, the iron plates, the iron nails, the agricultural forge or smithy, and the other goods specifically referred to in the judgment were not contraband at all. They were not for "use in war" at all, still less were they intended "solely" for that use; nor were

On the ground that Vladivostock, although also an important commercial port, was a Russian naval station, the Prize Court seems to have assumed (and to have largely based its judgment on the assumption) that no innocent trade to that port could be carried on during time of war, and that all goods entering the port during war must necessarily be treated as destined for or intended for the use of the Russian army or navy. Such an assumption was wholly unjustifiable; the port was not blockaded, and even if any part of the cargo could with propriety or with regard to international rules or the Japanese Notification have been condemned as either conditional or unconditional contraband, the condemnation should in any event have been confined to the contraband shipments; nor did the circumstance of the whole cargo having been shipped by Kunst and Albers justify the condemnation of the whole.

For the reasons above set forth, it is submitted that the condemnation of the "Paros" and her cargo was wholly irregular and unjustifiable, and the English underwriters, who are the sufferers, respectfully request His Majesty's Government to make diplomatic representations to the Government of His Imperial Majesty the Mikado with a view to their being indemnified by the latter Government in respect of their loss.

Report

The circumstances of the case are not, in our opinion, such as to warrant His Majesty's Government in making representations to the Japanese Government, and, although the German Government might take a different view of the case, we do not think that His Majesty's Government could, with advantage, suggest to that Government that it should take up a case the presentation of which His Majesty's Government was not prepared to support. The form of the judgment of the Supreme Prize Court appears to be in accordance with the Japanese Notification on the subject of contraband, and since most of the articles condemned as absolute contraband are, so far as we are aware of their character, materials for the construction of war-ships or the manufacture of arms or ammunition, or for the use of forces in the field, we think it would be difficult to complain of the decision in this respect, or, indeed, of the condemnation of innocent articles belonging to the same owner. As regards the condemnation of the ship, we think that there was evidence on which the Court could properly act that the owner attempted, by simulated documents, to mislead the Japanese (in the case of seizures) as to the true destination of the vessel. Their conduct was therefore such as the Japanese were entitled to treat as fraudulent, and a good ground for condemnation of the ship.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, May 11, 1907.

Mr. J. E. de Becker's divestment of his British nationality
by marriage with a Japanese
subject.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list, which relate to the national status of Mr. J. E. de Becker, a solicitor, resident in Yokohama.

In 1891 Mr. de Becker, at that time a natural born British subject, contracted a marriage with a Japanese lady, the marriage being accompanied by the Japanese ceremony of adoption into his wife's family. As a consequence of this step Mr. de Becker became, in contemplation of the Japanese law of adoption on marriage, a naturalized Japanese subject.

In 1901, two years after the jurisdiction hitherto exercised by the British Courts in Japan, and all the exceptional privileges, exemptions, and immunities enjoyed by British subjects as a part of or appurtenant to such jurisdiction, had, under Article XX of the Treaty of 1894 between Great Britain and Japan (Paper A), absolutely ceased and determined, Mr. de Becker contracted a second marriage, also with a Japanese lady. This marriage was, however, not accompanied by any ceremony of adoption into his wife's family.

The case of Mr. de Becker was brought to the notice of His Majesty's Ambassador at Tôkiô (see Sir C. MacDonald's despatch No. 45 of the 20th July, 1905) (Paper B), as the result of the removal of the former's name by His Majesty's Consul at Yokohama from the register of British subjects kept at His Majesty's Consulate, on his being informed by the local authorities that Mr. de Becker had acquired the status of a Japanese subject.

It was at first assumed from Sir C. MacDonald's despatch that both marriages had been accompanied by the ceremony of adoption, and, after consultation with the Home Office, his Excellency was informed on the 4th July, 1906, that it appeared to be unnecessary, in view of Mr. de Becker's second marriage in 1901, to consider the question of the effect of his first marriage upon his national status in contemplation of English law; that assuming that the law of Japan, whereby an alien who contracts a marriage with a Japanese subject and is adopted into her family becomes a Japanese subject by naturalization, had remained in force since the cesser in 1899 of Her Majesty's extra-territorial jurisdiction in that Empire, and was, therefore, the law at the time of Mr. de Becker's second marriage, the latter would appear not only to have become a Japanese subject in contemplation of Japanese law, but to have become voluntarily naturalized in Japan within the meaning of section 6 of "The Naturalization Act, 1870" (Paper C), and accordingly to have ceased to be, in contemplation of English law, a British subject.

On the 27th September, 1906, however, a further despatch was received from Sir C. MacDonald (Paper D), inclosing two letters from Mr. de Becker on the subject. In the first letter Mr. de Becker maintains that it was, at the time of his first marriage in 1891, impossible for him to become voluntarily naturalized in Japan, inasmuch as the mere existence of the extra-territorial jurisdiction at that time exercised by Her Majesty precluded the possibility of his divesting himself of his British nationality, nor could he be deemed to be "within any foreign State," within the meaning of section 6 of "The Naturalization Act, 1870," since he was subject only to the laws of his country of origin. This contention appears to be based upon the view expressed by Mr. (now Sir F.) Piggott in his treatise on "Exterritoriality," in which (p. 156) he suggests that a British subject is, as regards a foreign country wherein Her Majesty possesses extra-territorial jurisdiction, "under a disability" which prevents him from becoming naturalized in such a country.

This view—which, so far as is known, has not been put forward by any other writer—seems to be founded on an obvious misconception of the meaning of the word "disability," which is clearly defined in section 17 of the "Naturalization Act, 1870," which seems to have escaped the notice of the author, as meaning "the status of being an infant, lunatic, idiot, or married woman," and nothing else.

In his second letter, Mr. de Becker points out that his intention, on the occasion of his first marriage, in entering his wife's family by adoption, was simply to complete the marriage, but not to acquire naturalization, and that it was only after going through the ceremony that he became aware that he was deemed to have become a Japanese subject in contemplation of Japanese law. As regards his second marriage, Mr. de Becker also observes that the mere marriage of a British subject with a Japanese woman, without adoption into her family, does not, as a consequence, involve the naturalization of the former, whereas by the lex loci it does involve the loss of her Japanese status by the latter.

Sir Edward Grey has again consulted Mr. Secretary Gladstone, and it will be seen from the letter from the Home Office of the 10th April (Paper E) that Mr. Gladstone agrees with the view held by the Secretary of State that, if the facts and the law in regard to Mr. de Becker's second marriage in 1901 are now correctly stated, the question of his national status is dependent upon his first marriage in 1891; that by the latter marriage Mr. de Becker acquired Japanese nationality in contemplation of Japanese law, and that, moreover, he divested himself thereby of his British national status by virtue of section 6 of "The Naturalization Act, 1870."

I am to invite your attention to two opinions of the then Law Officers of the Crown—the first dated the 15th October, 1877 (Paper F), dealing with the case of Mr. Robert Miers, a British subject resident in the Bonin Islands (a dependency of Japan), who made a declaration renouncing British protection and adopting Japanese nationality; and the second, dated the 3rd December, 1892 (Paper G), in which the opinion is expressed that a British subject may become "voluntarily naturalized," either by taking formal steps for his naturalization, or by acting in a manner which, by the law of the foreign State, makes him a subject of that State, but that in the latter case he must have acted with knowledge of the consequences which his act, according to the law of the foreign State, entailed.

I am to request that you will take these papers into your consideration, and that you will be so good as to favour Sir Edward with your opinion:—

(1.) Whether it is competent for a British subject, when within the limits of a State in which His Majesty exercises extra-territorial jurisdiction, to voluntarily divest himself of his British national status within the meaning of section 6 of the Naturalization Act of 1870.

(2.) Should the reply to the above question be in the affirmative, whether Mr. de Becker, by going through the Japanese ceremony of adoption into his wife's family on the occasion of his first marriage in 1891, did so voluntarily divest himself of his British nationality, although, as he asserts, it was merely his intention to complete his marriage, and not to become a naturalized subject of the Emperor of Japan.

(3.) Sir Edward would also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general character which you may desire to offer upon the papers now submitted to you.

Report.

(1.) In our opinion it is competent for a British subject, when within the limits of a State in which His Majesty exercises extra-territorial jurisdiction, to voluntarily divest himself of his British national status within the meaning of section 6 of "The Naturalization Act, 1870."

(2.) That if at the date of Mr. de Becker's first marriage the mere fact of his adoption into his wife's family made him, according to the Japanese law, a Japanese subject, and if Mr. de Becker was, at the time he entered into this marriage, ignorant of this provision of Japanese law, he did not thereby voluntarily divest himself of his British nationality. If, however, he was aware of the effect upon his national status, according to Japanese law, of his marriage in the form adopted, or if, as Mr. Troup's letter of the 14th December seems to imply, he did other acts the sole object of which was to acquire a Japanese nationality, we think that he voluntarily divested himself of his nationality within the meaning of the Act.

In determining whether the conduct of Mr. de Becker justly leads to the inference that his action involved a voluntary renunciation of British allegiance, we think that it would be right to hold that he must be bound—

(a.) By the language of any document signed by him which expressly or by necessary inference imported such renunciation; or

(b.) By acts which to his knowledge could only be properly done by him after a surrender of his British nationality.

We think the same result should follow if the expressions were used and acts taken with indifference to the consideration whether they did or did not involve a surrender of British nationality. The motive for such conduct, whether it were to contract a Japanese marriage or not, does not in our opinion affect the application of these principles.

Upon the facts of this case there can be no hesitation in applying the rule that every man must be bound by the consequences of his acts.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, January 21, 1907.

I HAVE the honour to transmit to you herewith, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, the accompanying draft Persian Coast and Islands Order in Council, together with the papers relating thereto.

The Officiating Political Resident in the Persian Gulf (who, as you are aware, is at the same time His Majesty's Consul-General at Bushire) suggested to the Government of India, in 1903, that Article 32, Part 6, of the Persian Coasts and Islands Order, 1889, should be amended so as to admit of Vice-Admiralty cases being tried, in the absence of the Consul-General, by that officer's First Assistant. The Government of India and the India Office approved this suggestion, and on the 2nd September, 1903, addressed a letter to this Department (Paper B), inviting the concurrence of the Marquess of Lansdowne to the insertion of this amendment.

In a letter dated the 17th September of the same year (Paper C), this Department replied that Lord Lansdowne had no objection to the proposal to invest the First Assistant with the necessary powers, but that, in view of the abolition of Courts of Vice-Admiralty since the date of the Order in question, he would suggest the repeal of Article 32 and the substitution for it of another Article corresponding to those inserted in recent Orders for conferring Admiralty jurisdiction, and containing the desired special provision regarding the Assistant.

The India Office, on the 23rd September, 1903, addressed a letter to this Department (Paper D), expressing their concurrence in this proposal, and in a further communication, dated the 11th May, 1904 (Paper E), suggested certain additional amendments as the result of a telegraphic correspondence with the Government of India.

In view of these suggestions, the moment appeared to this Department to be a favourable one for a general revision of the Order in such directions as the experience of the fourteen years which had elapsed since its promulgation showed to be advisable, and for the consolidation with it of the Persian Coast and Islands Order in Council, 1895, which was itself nothing but an amendment of the earlier Order.

On the 11th June, 1904, Lord Lansdowne accordingly caused a letter (Paper F) to be addressed to Mr. Albert Gray, requesting him to draft an Order in Council giving effect to the amendments proposed by the India Office, and embodying such clauses of general application, which had been introduced into various draft Orders in Council recently prepared by him, as might be of advantage in the present case.

On the 4th October, 1904, Mr. Gray submitted a first draft of such an Order, with notes in which he called attention to new and altered provisions, and raised some questions which appeared to him to require consideration by this Department and by the India Office.

This draft and the notes were subsequently revised by Mr. Gray in consultation with Mr. Hurst, Assistant Legal Adviser to this Department, and the draft Order, as amended in the light of their discussions (Paper G), was forwarded on the 25th October, 1905, to the India Office, with the suggestion that it should be submitted to the Government of India for their observations.

On the 21st November, 1906, the India Office addressed a letter (Paper H) to this Department, forwarding a copy of a despatch from the Government of India, returning the draft Order with certain further amendments, and in this form it has now been reprinted (Paper I).

I am to request that you will take the draft (Paper I) into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 29, 1907.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit for your consideration the papers noted in the accompanying list relating to the claim of the Cuba Submarine Telegraph Company for the payment of the arrears of subsidy due under the terms of the Concession granted to them by the Spanish Government by Royal Decree dated the 29th September, 1895.

According to the terms of this Decree, an annual subsidy, amounting to 10,500 pesos gold (about 2,100*l.*) was to be paid to the Company in monthly instalments by the Treasury of the Island of Cuba until the expiry of the Concession in August 1910. The payments took place regularly up to the 31st December, 1898, at which date the Spanish Government, under the Treaty of Peace at the termination of the war between Spain and the United States of America, relinquished all claim to sovereignty over Cuba, and the island passed temporarily into the occupation of the United States.

The Company thereupon endeavoured to obtain payment of their subsidy from the Government of the United States, but, being unsuccessful in their efforts, they applied for the intervention of His Majesty's Government, who, in virtue of the opinion expressed by the former Law Officers in their reports dated the 2nd May, 1899, and the 30th November, 1900, urged the United States' Government to undertake the obligations entailed by the Concession. This application did not, however, lead to any result, and eventually, on the advice of His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington, it was decided that further action should be suspended until a permanent Government had been constituted in Cuba.

The Cuban Republic was established on the 20th May, 1902, shortly after which date the Company applied to the new Government, with the support of His Majesty's Minister at Havana, for the payment of their subsidy. They met, however, with a fresh refusal, based upon the fact that the payment of the subsidy was an engagement contracted by Spain, that Cuba was not a contracting party, and that the Concession was the outcome of a measure of war.

The claim was subsequently prosecuted in the Cuban Law Courts, resulting in adverse decisions in both Courts, that of the Supreme Court being given on the 11th October, 1906.

Thereupon the Company, seeing no other course open to them but to attempt to recover the money from the Spanish Government, approached Sir E. Grey in April last with the request that the claim might be presented through His Majesty's Embassy at Madrid.

Sir E. Grey recognizes that the matter presents a question of international law of considerable difficulty, but while at first sight it might be held that the obligations originally attaching to Spain in Cuba had devolved upon her successors in the sovereignty over that island, it appears to him, on a full examination of the peculiar circumstances in which the Concession was granted, that the liability of the Spanish of subsidy.

Government cannot properly be held to have devolved either on the United States' Government or on the present Government of Cuba.

The Concession, as stated above, was granted in the year 1895, at a period when a rebellion or insurrection was in progress in Cuba. The General in command of the Spanish forces in the island seems continually to have been impeded in his military operations through the interception by the insurgents of land telegraphic communications between various towns. He consequently made strong representations to the Government at Madrid as to the military necessity for uninterrupted communication between the ports of strategic importance in the island, especially those on the south coast between Cienfuegos and Santiago de Cuba. The result of these representations was the Concession under which the Company contracted to lay the necessary cables with great expedition and under heavy penalties for delay, the Government of Spain, in return, undertaking to pay the substantial subsidy above referred to.

These being the circumstances in which the Concession was granted, three points present themselves which appear to be of considerable weight in fixing liability, viz. :—

1. The facts are consistent with the Concession being a strategic measure for purposes of war.
2. The facts are inconsistent with its being merely a local industrial improvement.
3. The Government of Spain have had the benefit of the contract.

I am to request that you will take the above statements into your consideration together with the inclosed papers, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to whether a claim for the arrears of subsidy can now be preferred by means of diplomatic representation against the Spanish Government, and, if so, upon what grounds it should be based.

I am to ask that you will be good enough to furnish Sir E. Grey with your reply at as early a date as may be convenient to you, as there are reasons making it desirable that the claim, if presented at all, should be urged with the utmost dispatch.

I have, &c.

Report.

In our opinion, a claim for the arrears of subsidy may properly be preferred by means of diplomatic representation against the Spanish Government.

The claim should be based on the grounds that the obligation was contracted by the Spanish Government personally in the name of the King, and not by the colonial Cuban authorities, and that it was undertaken as a military measure in the interests of the Spanish Government, who have had the benefit of the performance of the contract by the claimants.

It cannot be said, however, that the question is free from doubt. The contract related to a local undertaking, and payment was to be made out of the local Exchequer.

Although we think that the latter stipulation was merely a direction as to payment for the convenience of the parties, it is perhaps open to the contention that it was intended as a condition attaching to payment.

In pressing the claim, His Majesty's Government will be in some degree prejudiced by reason of the delay, and the fact that they have on previous occasions made the claim against the successors in Cuba of the Spanish Government.

The Law Officers of the Crown to Home Office.—(Communicated to Foreign Office April 5.)

THE Law Officers of the Crown are requested to advise the Secretary of State on questions which have arisen in connection with the case of one Joseph Keller, of Swiss nationality.

The facts are as follows :—

On the 14th November, 1905, property to the value of 6,000l. was stolen from the house of Mrs. Val Prinsep, at No. 1, Holland Park Road, W. Two men of Swiss nationality, Otto Keller and Joseph Keller, were shortly afterwards arrested in Zurich, Switzerland, in possession of some of the stolen property. On the 1st January, 1906, the men being then in custody in Switzerland, a warrant was issued at the West London Police Court for their arrest on the charge of being concerned together in stealing the property.

The offence charged against the men is included in the list of extradition crimes in the Extradition Treaty with Switzerland (see Article II), but as Article I, paragraph 1, of the Treaty forbids the surrender by the Swiss Government of Swiss citizens "who having been charged with . . . crimes or offences enumerated in Article II, committed in the territory of the one party, shall be found within the territory of the other," it was impossible to obtain their extradition to this country. In accordance, however, with the second paragraph of the same Article, arrangements were made for the prosecution in Switzerland of the two men for the offence committed in London. The result of the prosecution was that both men were convicted and sentenced to terms of imprisonment. During the proceedings, however, Joseph Keller effected his escape, and his conviction was, in consequence, par contumace.

It was ascertained in September last that Joseph Keller had returned to London, and the Swiss Government applied for his extradition in accordance with Article V (a) and (c) of the Treaty. By section 26 of "The Extradition Act, 1870," under the heading "Definition of terms," the expression "accused person" includes a person convicted "for contumacy." The Secretary of State by order, under section 7 of the Extradition Act, notified the receipt of this requisition to the Magistrate at Bow Street and required him to issue a warrant for Keller's arrest, but Mr. Marsham was of opinion that as the offence was not committed "in the territory" of Switzerland, he had no power to issue a warrant. A copy of his letter is attached.

The questions then arose whether it was possible to prosecute Joseph Keller in England for being concerned in stealing property from Mrs. Val Prinsep's house, or, failing that, whether it was possible to take proceedings for his expulsion under section 3 (1), (b), (ii) of "The Aliens Act, 1905."

As regards his prosecution in England (apart from the question whether the necessary evidence is now available), there arises a doubt whether he would not be able successfully to raise the plea of "autrefois convict." The case of Hutchinson referred to in a note in 1 Leach 135 has been regarded as authority for the view that a man tried abroad for an offence committed abroad and acquitted by the foreign Court cannot be tried again for the same offence in England. A conviction abroad would presumably have the same effect as an acquittal; but it is doubtful whether Hutchinson's case, even if it decides the law as to crimes committed abroad would extend to crimes committed in England. Hutchinson had committed murder in Portugal; apparently he could not have been tried in this country except by virtue of the Statute 33 Henry VIII, cap. 33. This Statute gave the Crown power to issue special commissions for the trial of persons "vehemently suspected" of treason, misprision of treason, or murder, irrespective of the country in which the offence was committed. Under this Statute, persons, it seems, could be tried for murders committed abroad (as they can now be under section 9 of the offences against the Person Act); but this was clearly not the primary intention of the Statute. The Judges in Hutchinson's case may well have thought the power to try a man for an offence committed outside the realm was open to much doubt, and may have wished to limit it as strictly as possible. Or again, their decision may have been founded on the wording of the Statute under which it was proposed to try Hutchinson. At all events, it seems very slender authority for holding that a Court having jurisdiction by the common law to try a man for an offence committed in this country, is debarred from doing so whenever the defendant happens to have been tried and either convicted or acquitted by the Court of a foreign country. The fact that in many countries a defendant can be convicted par contumace, and that the Courts of this country have no guarantee that the proceedings abroad were not collusive, makes it all the more difficult to accept such a contention. The note in Leach of Hutchinson's case appears of insufficient authority to support a doctrine so markedly opposed to the ordinary principles of English law, and no other authority is cited in the text-books. In R. v. Roche (1 Leach 134), the defendant at first pleaded "autrefois acquit" on the ground of an acquittal by a Dutch Court, but afterwards withdrew the plea and was tried on the general issue.

Supposing a murder or other crime was committed in this country by a foreigner, who thereupon submitted himself for trial in his own country (possibly by a Court notoriously inefficient or corrupt), and either secured an acquittal or was convicted and received a nominal sentence, or was convicted par contumace and suffered no punishment at all, would the Courts of this country allow a plea of "autrefois acquit" or "autrefois convict" to oust their jurisdiction?

As regards his expulsion. The terms of section 3 of "The Aliens Act, 1905," are as follows:—

"3.—(1.) The Secretary of State may, if he thinks fit, make an order (in this Act referred to as an expulsion order) requiring an alien to leave the United Kingdom within a time fixed by the order, and thereafter to remain out of the United Kingdom

"(b.) If it is certified to him by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction after proceedings taken for the purpose within twelve months after the alien has last entered the United Kingdom, in accordance with rules of Court, made under section 29 of "The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879," that the alien

"(ii.) Has entered the United Kingdom after the passing of this Act, and has been sentenced in a foreign country with which there is an Extradition Treaty for a crime not being an offence of a political character, which is, as respects that country, an extradition crime within the meaning of "The Extradition Act, 1870."

In section 26 of the Extradition Act of 1870 "extradition crime" is defined as a "crime which, if committed in England or within English jurisdiction, would be one of the crimes described in the first Schedule to this Act. Larceny is included in that Schedule.

There is a doubt whether Keller can be held to have been convicted of an offence for a crime which is, as respects Switzerland, "an extradition crime within the meaning of "The Extradition Act, 1870," though the crime is included in the Treaty with Switzerland, if it is held (as Mr. Marsham holds) that he cannot be extradited because the crime was not committed in Swiss territory.

The Law Officers are therefore requested to advise on the following questions:—

1. Can Keller be prosecuted for larceny in England, he having already been convicted of that offence in Switzerland, or can he plead "autrefois convict?"

2. Does it make any difference that he was convicted par contumace, and that the term "accused person" includes a person convicted for contumacy?

3. If Keller had been acquitted in Switzerland (say from insufficient evidence), could he plead "autrefois acquit" to an indictment in England?

4. As Keller's offence in England, though not committed in Swiss territory, constituted an offence in Switzerland also, could Switzerland apply for his extradition?

5. Can Keller be said to have been "sentenced" within the meaning of that expression as used in section 3 (1) (b) (ii) of "The Aliens Act, 1905," his sentence being only a sentence par contumace?

6. Does Keller's offence constitute "an extradition crime within the meaning of "The Extradition Act, 1870," for the purpose of section 3 (1) (b) (ii) of "The Aliens Act, 1905?"

M. le Secrétaire d'État,

Londres, le 9 Octobre, 1906.

Le Conseil Fédéral me charge et j'ai l'honneur de faire appel aux extrêmes bons offices de votre Excellence à l'effet d'obtenir l'extradition du nommé Joseph Keller, de nationalité Suisse.

Cet individu a été condamné par la Cour d'Assises de Soleure (Suisse), le 20 Juin dernier, à cinq ans de travaux forcés pour vol commis à Londres. Mais pendant l'instruction il a réussi à s'évader, et on a tout lieu de croire qu'il s'est réfugié sur territoire Britannique.

Pour les antécédents de cette affaire je me réfère à la correspondance échangée entre le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté et la Légation de Grande-Bretagne à Berne.

En vue d'obtenir la délivrance d'un mandat d'arrêt provisoire contre Keller, je m'étais adressé, comme de coutume, à Bow Street Police Court. Malheureusement, vu que je n'étais pas en mesure de produire le jugement de condamnation, qui est actuellement en mains de l'autorité Britannique ("Home Office"), le Juge, Mr. Marsham, a déclaré ne pas pouvoir accéder à ma requête.

En priant votre Excellence de consentir à prendre note de la demande d'extradition de mon Gouvernement, je lui serais donc vivement obligé de vouloir bien faire faire les démarches requises pour l'obtention du mandat d'arrêt nécessaire pour l'arrestation éventuelle de Keller.

Veillez, &c.

Mr. Marsham to Home Office.

Police Court, Bow Street, October 17, 1906.

Sir,

By the 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 52, sec. 2, when an arrangement has been made with any foreign State with respect to the surrender to such State of any fugitive criminals Her Majesty may by Order in Council direct this Act to apply to the case of such foreign State, and may by the same or any subsequent order limit the operation of the order . . . and render its operation subject to such conditions, exceptions, and qualifications as may be deemed expedient. By section 5, when an order applying this Act in the case of any foreign State has been published in the Gazette, this Act shall, subject to the limitations, restrictions, conditions, exceptions and qualifications, if any, contained in the Order, apply in the case of such foreign State. By the definition fugitive criminal, means any person accused or convicted of an extradition crime committed within the jurisdiction of any foreign State, who is in, or suspected of being in, some part of Her Majesty's dominions.

By Article I of the Treaty with Switzerland an extradition offence must have been committed in the territory of the demanding State. I can find no authority for a country delivering up a person demanded by another State where the alleged offence was wholly committed within the territory of the State where the person demanded is found.

"Moore on Extradition," vol. 1, p. 812, in an article on Switzerland, lays it down that "It is an acknowledged principle that extradition can only take place for an act committed outside of the territory of the State on which the requisition is made."

See also 2, "Paul Bernard on Extradition," pp. 198 to 202, and 662.

I am therefore of opinion that I have no power to issue a warrant for the apprehension of Joseph Keller for the offence of larceny committed in this country, on the ground that it was not committed within the jurisdiction and within the territory of Switzerland, on the true construction of the Act combined with the Treaty.

I have, &c.

(Signed) R. H. B. MARSHAM.

Opinion.

1. In our opinion Keller can be prosecuted here for the larceny referred to in the case, notwithstanding that he has already been convicted of it in Switzerland. The question is not entirely free from difficulty, but we incline to think that notwithstanding the comity of nations the English Courts would, according to ancient doctrine, be held to be the only Courts possessed of competent jurisdiction to try persons for offences against the English Criminal Law committed in this country, and accordingly we think that a plea of "autrefois convict" would fail.

2. We do not consider that in any view a conviction par contumace would support a plea of "autrefois convict" as such a conviction does not appear to be final. We are not informed what is the Swiss law or that of the particular Canton in which Keller was convicted, but assuming a conviction par contumace to be the same as in France it is certainly not final (see re Coppin, L. R. 2 C. A. 47). We may point out that the terms both of the Treaty and the Extradition Act favour the foregoing view. A person convicted par contumace is there defined merely as an accused person.

3. We think not for reasons analogous to those given in our answer to the first question.

4. No, as under Article I of the Treaty Switzerland can only apply for extradition of persons who have committed offences in Swiss territory.

5. We think that a sentence par contumace is a sufficient sentence for the purposes of the Aliens Act, and we accordingly answer this question in the affirmative.

6. In our opinion Keller's offence does constitute for the purposes of the Aliens Act an "extradition crime" within the meaning of "The Extradition Act, 1870." We think that the section of the Aliens Act merely adopts for the purposes of that Act the crimes mentioned in the Extradition Act, and does not make it necessary that the conditions essential to extradition should exist in relation to such crimes.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, February 1, 1907.

I HAVE the honour to inclose the draft of an Order in Council for giving effect to a Supplementary Extradition Convention concluded between Great Britain and the United States of America on the 12th April, 1905, adding bribery, and offences against bankruptcy law, to the list of extraditable offences contained in former Conventions between the two countries. A copy of the Act of Parliament ("The Extradition Act, 1906.") which was passed on the 4th August, 1906, to include bribery among extradition crimes is also inclosed for convenience of reference.

The Ratifications of this Convention were exchanged at Washington on the 21st December, 1906.

The various Departments of His Majesty's Government which are interested in the matter have concurred in the terms of the draft Order in Council, and I am to request that you will be good enough to inform Secretary Sir E. Grey at your early convenience whether, in your opinion, it may properly be submitted to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

Law Officers of the Crown to Colonial Office.

My Lord,

Royal Courts of Justice, June 29, 1907.

WE were honoured by your Lordship's commands, signified to us by Mr. Bertram Cox in his letter of the 20th instant, stating that, with reference to our letter of the 30th November, advising as to a draft Order in Council which had been drawn up to give effect to the modus vivendi concluded with the United States of America on the Newfoundland fisheries question, he was directed by your Lordship to request that we would favour you with our advice on a further point which had arisen in connection with this question.

That, as we were aware, it was not considered necessary to issue the proposed Order in Council last year, but that this year it would probably be necessary to renew the modus vivendi with the United States, and that, in order to secure such a renewal, it was possible that His Majesty's Government might have to consent to the use by the American fishermen of purse seines.

That in our opinion referred to we pointed out that the right conferred on His Majesty in Council to make Regulations under section 1 of the Act 59 Geo. III, cap. 38, was confined to such Regulations and instructions as might be necessary for carrying into effect the purposes of the Convention, and that it would appear to follow that the Colonial Regulation No. 20 forbidding the use of purse seines in the waters of Newfoundland could only be suspended as far as it applied to American fishermen, if it could be held that its suspension was necessary to carry out the Convention.

That your Lordship did not consider that the mere prohibition to use purse seines could be held to defeat the purposes of the Convention, but that it was necessary to take into consideration the fact that the Newfoundland Government had decided to put in force the provisions of the Bait Act against any Newfoundland fishermen aiding the Americans in their fishing. That the Supreme Court of Newfoundland had affirmed the conviction of the two fishermen to which reference was made in our Report, and that, while a reference would be made to us shortly as to the correctness of this decision, your Lordship was not prepared to dispute the claim of the Newfoundland Government to prevent the inhabitants of Newfoundland from aiding the American fishermen. But that the aid of these fishermen was essential for the use of the gill net, and that it seemed to your Lordship that by insisting on prohibiting the use of purse seines, while also prohibiting the employment of Newfoundland fishermen on American vessels, the Colonial Government was in effect impeding or destroying the American Treaty rights.

That your Lordship would accordingly be glad if we would take his letter and the papers referred to into our consideration, and advise you whether His Majesty has power by Order in Council under section 1 of the Act 59 Geo. III, cap. 38, to direct that No. 20 of the Newfoundland Fishery Rules for 1907, so far as it related to purse seines, should not apply to American fishermen exercising their Treaty rights of fishery.

We have taken the matter into our consideration, and in obedience to your Lordship's commands have the honour to

That, in our opinion, His Majesty has power by Order in Council under section 1 of the Act 59 Geo. III, cap. 38, to direct that No. 20 of the Newfoundland Fishery Rules for 1907, so far as it relates to purse seines, shall not apply to inhabitants of the United States exercising their rights of fishing under the Convention of 1818 if, as appears to be the case, such an order is deemed necessary for carrying the Convention of 1818 into effect.

I AM directed by the Earl of Elgin to request that you will be so good as to favour him with your opinion at your early convenience as to whether application should be made to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for leave to appeal from the decision of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland in the matter of an appeal from the decision of Mr. Levi March in the case of O'Reilly v. Crane and Dubois.

2. I am to inclose copies of the judgments delivered by the Magistrate, and on appeal by the Supreme Court of the Colony, of the Petition for leave to appeal to the Privy Council which has been addressed to the Court, and of a Memorandum by counsel for the appellant, from which the facts of the case will appear. I am also to inclose copies of Memoranda drawn up in this Department, which form the grounds on which the Memorandum of the counsel engaged rests. Copies of the documents referred to in these Memoranda are inclosed.

3. It will be observed from the correspondence with the Governor of the Colony, a copy of which is inclosed, that Lord Elgin is advised that under the Charter of Justice there is doubt whether the Supreme Court has any power to grant leave to appeal to the Privy Council, since the charge brought against Crane and Dubois appears to be essentially a criminal one, and no power is given to the Court in the Charter to grant leave to appeal in such cases. Lord Elgin is also advised that the grounds for believing that such an appeal can be allowed which were advanced on the opinion of the Attorney-General of Newfoundland are doubtful.

4. Lord Elgin would accordingly be glad to learn—

(1.) Whether, in your opinion, a decision in favour of the fishermen might reasonably be expected on appeal to the Judicial Committee if leave were granted;

(2.) Whether it is probable that the Judicial Committee would be prepared to grant special leave to appeal, in view of the importance of the issues involved;

(3.) Whether, in the event of the Supreme Court granting leave to appeal, the appeal can be prosecuted in view of leave granted by the Supreme Court in the Colony, or whether it would still be necessary to apply for special leave.

(4.) Generally.

5. I am to add that Lord Elgin is not without hope that it may be possible so to arrange matters with the Premier of Newfoundland as to render the prosecution of an appeal unnecessary, but he is anxious to obtain your advice as soon as possible as to whether an appeal would be likely to succeed.

Foreign Office, August 28, 1907.

Gentlemen,

Claim of debenture holders of the Rio Grande Irrigation and Land Company.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list with regard to the claim of the debenture holders in the Rio Grande Irrigation and Land Company (Limited) against the United States' Government.

The issues involved in the case are comparatively simple, but have to some extent been obscured by the complications of a very protracted litigation initiated by the Government of the United States. This litigation, which in its various stages extends over several years and comprises some eight distinct judgments, most of which were favourable to the Company's case, has not yet apparently attained finality, but has resulted in entirely depleting the resources of the Company.

The history of the circumstances giving rise to the claim commences in 1893, when a Corporation called the Rio Grande Dam and Irrigation Company was formed in New Mexico according to local law. This was the parent Company of the English Company, whose debenture holders are the present claimants.

The objects of the New Mexican Corporation were to construct a storage dam, reservoir, and irrigation works at Elephant Butte, on the Rio Grande River, in New Mexico.

Powers for all these works were expressly granted by Acts of Congress, which authorized the occupation of public lands for the dam and reservoir site, and gave the right to dig across public lands for irrigation ditches.

A permit was also obtained from the Secretary of the Interior at Washington officially approving and sanctioning the scheme.

The parent Company, therefore, undoubtedly acquired certain Concessions, franchises, and privileges which the Government of the United States are legally and morally estopped from denying.

In May 1896 an English Company, the Rio Grande Irrigation and Land Company (Limited), was formed, which took over the rights and undertaking, and acquired control of the whole of the capital stock of the parent Company.

This Company, as the result of the costly litigation which consumed the whole of its paid-up capital, went into liquidation in April 1900, and the debenture bondholders obtained the appointment of a Receiver.

These debenture bondholders, who are the claimants, are represented in England by Mr. Chetham Strode, and in New Mexico by Dr. Nathan Boyd.

The cause of the ruinous and oppressive litigation is to be found in the existence of a rival irrigation scheme known as the "International (El Paso) Dam Project," promoted by Brigadier-General Anson, Commissioner for the United States, who obtained the institution of proceedings by the Federal authorities for an injunction to restrain the parent Company and the English Company from completing their irrigation works, which had already been actively commenced.

The litigation originated in 1897 by the United States' Government filing a Bill in Equity, alleging that the Rio Grande is a navigable river, and that the Company's works would be a violation of the Mexican Treaty rights, and claiming an injunction to restrain the works.

It is to be noted that, prior to the incorporation of the parent Company, an official report by Major Ernst to the Secretary of War in 1889 had declared the Rio Grande not to be navigable.

Notwithstanding this, and the Concessions which were in consequence granted by the United States' Government, the suit was instituted in May 1897 by the United States' District Attorney in New Mexico at the instance of the Legal Advisers of the United States' Government.

The course of the litigation may be summarized as follows:—

1. Trial in New Mexico Court.

The Court decided in favour of the Company, held that the Rio Grande was not a navigable river, and dissolved the injunction.

2. Appeal to Supreme Court of New Mexico.

The findings of the Trial Court on all points, which were entirely in favour of the Company, were upheld.

3. Appeal to Supreme Court of United States.

The findings of the Lower Courts in the Company's favour were affirmed.

The case was remanded to the Trial Court for inquiry on the question of fact whether the dam would destroy the existing navigability near the mouth of the river.

4. Trial Court, New Mexico (January 1900).

The Court held this inquiry, and took the evidence of thirty-three witnesses, affidavits, reports, &c. They dismissed the complaint, holding that the intended acts of Company would not substantially diminish the existing navigability.

5. Second appeal to Supreme Court of New Mexico.

The Lower Court was again upheld on all points.

6. Second appeal to Supreme Court of United States.

The Counsel for the United States' Government (apparently without any justification) alleged that the Judges of the two Lower Courts were influenced by local interests.

The Court a second time remanded the case to the Trial Court for further inquiry on the question of fact.

7. Supplemental Bill filed by the United States' Government in the Trial Court, New Mexico, claiming forfeiture of the Company's rights because their works had not been completed within the five years prescribed by law.

No notice of application for leave to file this new Bill and no notice of hearing reached the Company.

Judgment by default was entered against the Company.

8. Motion in Trial Court to vacate the decree of forfeiture.

The motion was made at the instance of Dr. Boyd, acting for the debenture bondholders.

January 1904. The Court overruled the motion, and the decree of forfeiture remains.

An appeal by Dr. Boyd to the Federal Supreme Court at Washington to set aside the decree of forfeiture was apparently pending in January 1907, but may have been suspended owing to want of funds.

It will be observed that the defendant Company was successful at no less than five distinct trials, in each case the Court finding in its favour on every point.

The successive appeals have been due to the action of the Attorney-General of the United States, who has thus kept the case continuously before the Courts for about six years.

The peculiarly oppressive feature of the case is that, after the Company had been successful in obtaining judgments in its favour during a litigation of several years on the original Bill, the United States' Government, without giving proper notice to the defendant Company, filed a Supplemental Bill totally inconsistent with the original one, and obtained judgment of forfeiture by default against the Company.

Dr. Boyd, the Receiver for the English debenture bondholders, on ascertaining this, in October 1903, took immediate steps to set aside this Decree, but without success.

Sir E. Grey is of opinion that the Company have been treated, not only oppressively, but with positive injustice, by the Government of the United States in the following respects:—

1. The Government, having granted a Concession to the Company under full legal sanction, subsequently litigated to restrain the Company from exercising the rights so granted on the grounds that the works authorized were illegal.

Even though the Government eventually succeeded in the Courts, the heavy expenditure incurred by the Company in consequence of the Concession would in itself raise a clear case for compensation.

2. After protracted litigation, but before the final determination of the legality of the works, the Government, without effective notice to the Company, applied to the Court on a new claim (the "Supplemental Bill") totally inconsistent with the former one, and, without the Company being represented before the Court, obtained judgment by default against the Company.

3. This judgment by default was a Decree of forfeiture, based solely on the non-completion of the work, which the action of the Government was alone responsible for.

The original Bill claimed that the Concession was illegal. The Supplemental Bill recognized the validity of the Concession by claiming its forfeiture in accordance with its strict terms.

4. Though the litigation is not finally determined, the Government are actually proceeding to execute the same irrigation works which they have sought to restrain the Company from doing.

In considering the steps which should now be adopted, Sir E. Grey has taken into account the well-known principle that all possible legal means of redress must have been resorted to before a claimant can seek diplomatic assistance. It is true that the Company have not exhausted all possible legal remedies, though they have exhausted all their financial resources in defending the very lengthy litigation. An appeal to the Federal Supreme Court at Washington to set aside the Decree of forfeiture, and possibly a subsequent ten years' litigation, may theoretically still be open. But, while fully recognizing that the depleted means of a claimant will not in general excuse the necessity for the prosecution of litigation to its final stage before diplomatic interference, the circumstances in this case are certainly exceptional.

In the note from the Department of State (see Inclosure in Mr. Bryce's No. 50, Commercial, of the 23rd April, 1907, Paper I) Mr. Root admits in terms that the United States' Government, owing to its Treaty obligations, is constrained to proceed with the work of construction without waiting for the judicial determination of the rights of the Company. Having thus advisedly acted as though the litigation had reached finality, the United States' Government would appear to be precluded by their conduct (in so acting on a Decree of forfeiture obtained against the Company by default and without notice) from objecting that the matter must be further contested in the Courts before steps be taken to secure its settlement diplomatically. In all the circumstances, therefore, Sir E. Grey is of opinion that His Majesty's Government would at the present stage be justified in intervening diplomatically on behalf of the Company (or on behalf of the English debenture bondholders), and that further delay will only be prejudicial to the claim.

Dr. Chetham Strode, on behalf of the English bondholders, urges that the matter should be referred to The Hague for arbitration. Sir E. Grey is disposed to consider that, having regard to the history of the case, the United States' Government would strongly resist such a course. They would, in his opinion, more readily consent to the creation of a Joint Commission for the purpose of examining the claim, and awarding redress if any be found to be due. This would serve the purpose of the Company equally well, as it would seem that any impartial and independent Commissioners must almost inevitably come to the conclusion that the case is one for compensation.

I am to request that you will be good enough to take the facts set forth above into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to the attitude which His Majesty's Government should adopt in the case.

I am to add that the papers noted in the list are sent in original, and should be returned to the Foreign Office when finished with.

Report.

In our opinion His Majesty's Government may properly support this claim without requiring the claimants to continue the litigation of the matter. The salient facts upon which a fair and reasonable claim can be based are, that the claimants are interested in certain rights or Concessions obtained in accordance with the laws of New Mexico and of the United States, and that the Government of the United States, by instituting litigation raising a contention unfounded in fact, have so delayed the execution of the works in question that forfeiture of the rights or Concessions has been incurred under the law of the United States. That the contention that the proposed works at Elephant Butte would interfere with the navigability of the Rio Grande is unfounded appears to be shown by the fact that the United States' Government are constructing similar works at or near the same place, but if the United States' Government really dispute this question, it would be a proper subject for adjudication by the Tribunal appointed to deal with the claim. It is not clear from the papers before us whether the effect of the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States of May 1899 was to restore the temporary injunction granted by the District Court of New Mexico, but even if the Company were not actually restrained, we do not think that their failure to proceed with the works while litigation was pending should debar them from compensation, though no doubt their case would be stronger if their works were actually restrained by injunction. We think that the United States' Government were entitled to institute the proceedings of May 1897 and to pursue them, and we doubt whether the proceedings for forfeiture in April 1903 are open to any complaint as a matter of law, though we think that, under the circumstances, it was unfair conduct on the part of the United States' Government to obtain and support a Decree made in default.

As indicated above, we do not think that the claim necessarily depends on the allegations of dishonesty made by the claimants, though no doubt the conduct of certain officials might be impugned in the course of the inquiry.

The claim could be properly referred either to The Hague or to a Joint Commission, but we think that the United States' Government would probably prefer the latter Tribunal.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. A copy of the Consular Salaries and Fees Act is also inclosed.

Sir E. Grey will be obliged if you will take the draft Order in Council into your consideration, and will favour him with your opinion as to whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

No. 2.

[April 22, 1908.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Nationality of the children of Prince
Henry and Prince
Louis of Battenberg.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 17, 1908

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to transmit to you the accompanying papers, which relate to the question of the nationality of the children of His Royal Highness the late Prince Henry of Battenberg, and of His Serene Highness Prince Louis of Battenberg.

It will be seen (Paper A) that His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Darmstadt reported on the 30th November last that, in connection with certain legal formalities initiated by His Serene Highness Prince Louis of Battenberg relative to estates held by him in the Grand Duchy of Hesse, the German Courts had requested that they might be furnished with a Declaration from a British authority that the children of His Serene Highness, and also those of the late Prince Henry of Battenberg, were British subjects.

His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department, to whom the matter was referred, stated (Paper B) that as regards the children of the late Prince Henry of Battenberg there is no difficulty, inasmuch as it appears that all four children (including Princess Victoria Eugénie, who is now Queen of Spain) were born in the United Kingdom, and their nationality is determined thereby. That with regard to the children of Prince Louis of Battenberg the same considerations apply to two of the children, viz., Princess Victoria Alice (now married to Prince Andrew of Greece) and Prince Louis François, who were both born in the United Kingdom; that the other two children of Prince Louis, viz., Princess Louise and Prince George, were, however, born in Germany in 1889 and 1892 respectively, and the question of their nationality is therefore not without difficulty.

Prince Louis of Battenberg obtained in 1868 a certificate of naturalization (of which a copy is inclosed (Paper C)) under "The Naturalization Act, 1844" (Paper D). By virtue of that certificate the Prince has the rights and capacities of a British subject, except any rights or capacities of a natural born British subject out of and beyond the Dominions of the British Crown and the limits thereof. The nationality of a child born abroad of a father naturalized under the Act of 1844 does not appear to have been authoritatively decided, but the opinions of your predecessors, which are referred to in the Home Office letter, and of which copies are inclosed (Papers E and F), are to the effect that the grant of a certificate under that Act is personal, and does not confer British nationality by descent on the children born abroad. In view, however, of the fact that the opinion of the Law Officers of 1860 (Paper E) is limited by the expression "the parent being abroad," inquiry has been made of Prince Louis of Battenberg whether at the time of the birth of the children in question His Serene Highness was or was not in the British Dominions.

It now appears from His Serene Highness' letter of the 16th January (Paper G) that at the time of the births of these children he was in Germany, and was consequently abroad (i.e., not within the King's Dominions). His Serene Highness further states in this letter that, with a view of avoiding any claim on the part of the German Government upon himself or his children as German subjects, he had fulfilled the necessary formalities, renouncing for himself and his descendants the position of a subject of the Grand Duke of Hesse and of the German Empire. It would seem to follow, therefore, that if Princess Louise and Prince George are neither British subjects nor German subjects, they are technically of no nationality.

The Home Office letter (Paper H) shows the reply which His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department suggests should be communicated to the German Courts in reply to their inquiry. In view, however, of the fact that the question is not wholly free from doubt, and also of the fact of His Serene Highness' near connection with the British Royal Family and his distinguished position in the public service of this country, Sir E. Grey would prefer, in the first instance, to submit the matter for your consideration.

It may be added that if it should be desired that Prince George of Battenberg

(born the 6th November, 1892, and consequently now in his sixteenth year) and Princess Louise (born the 13th July, 1889, and consequently now in her nineteenth year) should acquire British nationality, three possible courses suggest themselves, viz. :—

1. His Serene Highness Prince Louis of Battenberg might obtain a certificate of naturalization under the last paragraph of section 7 of "The Naturalization Act, 1870," which provides that—

"An alien who has been naturalized previously to the passing of that Act may apply . . . in the United Kingdom."

In this event Prince George and Princess Louise of Battenberg might acquire British nationality under section 10 (5) of the Act.

2. Prince George and Princess Louise of Battenberg might themselves be granted certificates of naturalization under section 7 of the Act.

Sir Edward Grey understands that the Secretary of State for the Home Department is willing for special reasons in particular cases to depart from the general rule that certificates of naturalization are not granted to minors, and to grant such certificates, waiving any question as to the validity of certificates so granted.

3. Prince George and Princess Louise of Battenberg could, if necessary, be naturalized by special Act of Parliament, although it is, as a rule, undesirable that recourse should be had to this procedure in cases where naturalization can be effected under the General Act.

Sir E. Grey would accordingly be glad if you would take the papers inclosed herewith into your consideration, and favour him at your earliest convenience with your opinion—

1. Whether Prince George and Princess Louise of Battenberg, being the children born abroad of His Serene Highness Prince Louis of Battenberg, who was naturalized a British subject under the Act of 1844, are or are not to be deemed naturalized British subjects.

2. In the latter case, how best the status of British subject can be conferred upon Prince George and Princess Louise.

3. As regards the terms of the Declaration which should, in the circumstances be furnished to the German Courts.

Sir E. Grey would also be glad to be furnished with any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer on the papers now submitted to you.

I have, &c.

Report.

1. In our opinion Prince George and Princess Louise, having been born abroad in the circumstances stated, are not natural born British subjects.

Whether by section 10 (5) of "The Naturalization Act, 1870," they have become naturalized British subjects on their becoming resident with their father in the United Kingdom is open to argument either way.

The Attorney-General thinks that if they have so become resident they are now naturalized, as the words of section 10 (5) are quite general, and appear to apply to all certificates of naturalization, whether granted under the Act of 1844 or the Act of 1870.

The Solicitor-General, however, is of the opinion that section 10 (5) only applies to the children of persons who have received certificates of naturalization under the 1870 Act.

In these circumstances we think it is desirable that Prince Louis should obtain a certificate of naturalization under the Act of 1870, in order that he may become clearly entitled to the benefit of section 10 (5).

2. We think that the best method of conferring the status of British subject upon Prince George and Princess Louise, if they have resided in the United Kingdom with their father, is to proceed as indicated in the above answer.

3. If the course above suggested is adopted, before furnishing the Declaration to the German Courts, we think that the Declaration should state that, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, the four children of Prince Henry, except Princess Victoria Eugénie, who is now Queen of Spain, and the four children of Prince Louis, except Princess Victoria Alice, who is now married to Prince Andrew of Greece, are British subjects.

The Declaration should further state that Princess Victoria Eugénie and Princess Victoria Alice were formerly British subjects, but have ceased to be so by reason of their respective marriages.

We assume that it is not necessary for the purposes of the proceedings in the German Courts to advert to any distinction between natural born and naturalized British subjects.

Memorandum by the Lord Chancellor.

THERE are two questions raised in these papers:—

1. Whether or not a Canadian Act, declaring Hudson's Bay in effect to be territorial water, and imposing a license fee on all vessels whale fishing there can be successfully defended.

2. What course should be pursued as a matter of policy in view of this Canadian claim.

In regard to the first of these questions I do not believe that any impartial Arbitrator would entertain the idea of treating Hudson's Bay as a mare clausum.

I think it is a mistake to treat controversies of this kind as if you could found upon logical inferences finely reasoned from the vague language of Charters or of Treaties. Many of the old Charters and the old claims (alike of England, Spain, and France) to possessions in the New World were of the widest description, and each nation has protested against the generality of the other's pretensions in forgetfulness of a similar error in its own. The United States in turn has been just as inconsistent in alternately advancing and denouncing titles of this kind on its own frontiers and in South America (e.g., Behring Sea, Alaskan Boundary and Venezuelan controversies, cum quibusdam aliis.) Municipal Acts of Parliament are obviously not binding on foreign nations and Treaties only bind the parties to them. So far as I can see here neither Charters nor Treaties nor Acts of Parliament definitely and unequivocally claim this status for Hudson's Bay. Such a claim would have been imperfectly understood in early days. But even if they did so claim in the most explicit manner it would by no means conclude a question in which the whole world has an interest. What counts is not the existence of unilateral documents, but the hard fact of user and occupation following upon a claim or the recognition of a claim by other nations because it has been preceded by user and occupation. Of this there is not a vestige in the Canadian contention. On the contrary, it is admitted that since 1861 at all events (and quite likely long before that) American whalers have uninterruptedly

Canadian Act declaring
Hudson's Bay to be territorial

and of right fished in Hudson's Bay. That fact alone would suffice to dispose of this question, in my view.

In regard to the arguments arising from the geographical configuration of this bay, there are no rules of international law and no principles of international usage which determine what are the physical requisites of a mare clausum. Indeed, when the infinite variety of inclosed or partially inclosed waters is considered, it is obvious that no such principles can be formulated, except in the most elastic terms. The shape and size of the waters in question, the nature and width of the approaches to them, their position as a means of access to the territory of one or more nations or of passage to waters beyond, are all ingredients and have to be considered as a whole. We are dealing with a sea 800 miles long by 600 miles in width at some parts, with seven entrances from the western end of the Straits, of which one is 29 miles and another 16 miles wide; and Hudson Strait is 460 miles long and 100 miles broad. Nothing short of an exclusive enjoyment or control, acquiesced in by nations in general, could make such a sheet of water territorial, and I do not find any instance quoted, in modern times, of any ship having been excluded or any act of sovereignty acquiesced in.

Notwithstanding the elaborate contentions of the Colonial Office, I cannot think that any weight of instructed opinion, either in Europe or America, would sustain us in arguing that the Canadian Government could treat Hudson Bay or Strait as territorial.

Upon the second point, I cannot say whether the contention of Sir Charles Lucas in his letter of 21st February, 1908 (that disallowance would not have the desired effect) is sound in law, because the Canadian Acts are not before me. If it be so, this technical point would not much signify. The important point is whether His Majesty's Government should afford any degree of sanction to an untenable claim by deliberately allowing an Act which affirmed it, when they have in their power to disclaim responsibility for that claim by public disallowance of the Act. I must observe, however, that the precedent of a Colony seeking to affirm by Colonial Statutes without the previous approval of His Majesty's Government propositions affecting the territorial rights or claims of other nations is very dangerous.

I think the "third alternative" suggested in Mr. Mallet's Minute (undated) to document 32027 has much to commend it, namely, that the Act should not be disallowed, but Canada should be formally notified that we cannot defend the position if assailed.

It seems almost the only course, now that Canada has confronted us with a peremptory choice, either to face the odious duty of disallowing the Act, or to accept some degree of responsibility towards foreign nations for a claim which is quite destitute of merit. My difficulty in accepting the "third alternative" is that it would leave the formal sanction to a claim which will not only be scouted by the United States, but will be used against us with deadly effect, unless we effectively repudiate it, in future disputes as to fisheries. And it is clearly against our interests, I should say, to encourage the enlargement of their territorial waters by other nations.

These considerations will no doubt be before the Cabinet, and at present I will say nothing further on the question of policy. It might be possible to say to Canada that the Act is not disallowed, but that, as at present advised, His Majesty's Government do not adopt its description of the status, and cannot undertake to maintain the claim as accurate or valid against other nations.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, June 25, 1908.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit herewith the draft of an Order in Council, to be called "The Foreign Jurisdiction (Probates) Order in Council, 1908," and certain papers connected therewith.

In all the foreign countries where extraterritorial jurisdiction is vested in His Council.

C

Foreign Jurisdiction
[Probates]
Council.

Majesty the British Courts have jurisdiction in matters of probate, and a provision also appears in slightly varying forms in all the Orders in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act creating such Courts to the effect that jurisdiction is to be exercised in conformity with English law.

The fees to be levied on grants of probate (which in actual practice are in the nature of, and take the place of, death duties) are prescribed in Rules of Court issued under these Orders in Council.

A copy of "The China and Corea Order in Council, 1904," and the Rules thereunder is inclosed herewith as a specimen (Paper G).

Difficulties have from time to time arisen as to the extent to which the provisions of the Finance Acts and similar Acts relating to the charging of death duties in this country are to be applied in dealing with estates under administration in these British Extraterritorial Courts.

Sir E. Grey does not think it necessary to trouble you with the details of these cases, but the documents numbered 1 and 3 in the accompanying printed paper (A) will serve as examples.

After full consideration of the question, Sir E. Grey decided, in consultation with the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, that an Order in Council under "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," should be enacted, applying to China, Corea, Turkey, Persia, Siam, and Morocco, regulating the levying of probate fees in the Courts established by the Orders in Council relating to those countries respectively, and the draft submitted herewith has been prepared accordingly.

The draft has been concurred in by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury. It has also been sent to the Judges of the various Courts concerned, and their observations have received careful consideration.

Article 6 of the draft is founded on section 28 (2) of "The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881," as amended by section 11 of "The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889." Article 7 is founded on sections 2 (2) and 3 of "The Finance Act, 1894," and Article 8 on section 7 of the same Act.

I am to request that you will take the draft Order into your consideration, and will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval. Sir E. Grey will also be glad to receive any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

[In Colonial Office,
August 20, 1908.]

[August 8, 1908.]

The Law Officers of the Crown to Colonial Office.

My Lord,

Law Officers' Department, August 8, 1908.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified to us in Mr. Antrobus's letter of the 25th May last, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us three despatches from the Governor of Ceylon with regard to the claim of the Colonial Government to exclusive rights in the pearl fisheries in the Gulf of Manaar, off the West Coast of Ceylon.

Claim of the Colonial Government to exclusive rights in the pearl fisheries in the Gulf of Manaar.

That this question formed the subject of correspondence in 1891 and 1892 in connection with the Chanks Ordinance of 1890, and that in the proceedings at the Behring Sea Arbitration frequent references were made to the rights of the Ceylon Government to the pearl fisheries. That a print containing that correspondence was inclosed, together with some extracts from the Behring Sea Arbitration proceedings and some papers, including two opinions by Law Officers of the Crown, relating to the pearl fisheries off the coast of Burmah and in the Persian Gulf. That a volume containing the Ceylon enactments relating to the pearl banks was also inclosed.

That in 1906 the Ceylon Pearl Fisheries were leased by the Government for a term of twenty years to the Ceylon Company of Pearl Fishers (Limited). That a copy of the lease was inclosed, and that from Article 11 it would be observed that the Company was expected to expend considerable sums annually upon the culture of the pearl oysters and the improvement of the pearl banks within the conceded area.

That, in view of the development now reported by the Governor, your Lordship desired that you might be favoured with our advice as regarded the extent of the rights of the Ceylon Government and the manner in which any infringement of those rights which might be attempted should be dealt with.

That Mr. Antrobus was accordingly to request us to take the papers into our consideration and advise your Lordship—

(1.) As to the extent of the area over which exclusive rights of fishing for pearl oysters could properly be claimed by the Ceylon Government.

(2.) What steps should be taken to protect those rights in the event of attempts being made to infringe them; and especially how far such infringements, if made by persons who were not British subjects or who poach from foreign vessels, should be met by legal proceedings in Ceylon, and how far by diplomatic representations.

(3.) Whether the Ceylon Government would be justified in taking possession of offending vessels outside the 3-mile limit.

We have taken the matter into our consideration, and, in obedience to your Lordship's commands, have the honour to

Report—

(1.) That we think that exclusive rights of fishing for pearl oysters can properly be claimed by the Ceylon Government over those banks and parts of the bottom of the sea as to which there is evidence of ancient user on the part of successive Governments of Ceylon in the exercise of their sovereign rights. Such user appears to have existed long antecedent to the suggestion or adoption of the 3-mile limit, and is therefore, in our opinion, not restricted by that limit.

(2.) We think that infringements by persons who are not British subjects should be met by legal proceedings in Ceylon. Diplomatic action would scarcely be appropriate except in cases where His Majesty's Government consider that the Government of the offender's country is in some way responsible for his acts.

(3.) We think that the Ceylon Government would be justified in taking possession of offending vessels within the area of the pearl banks although outside the 3-mile limit, but of course it would not be advisable to resort to such seizure unless it be found that adequate protection cannot be found otherwise.

We have, &c.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, October 22, 1908.

Proclamations of Neutrality:
Proposed amendments in wording of future.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit herewith, for your consideration, the papers noted in the accompanying list respecting the phraseology employed for many years past in the Proclamation of Neutrality which it is customary for the Sovereign to issue on the occasion of the outbreak of hostilities between foreign States with which this country is at peace.

The last occasion on which the necessity arose for issuing such a Proclamation was in February 1904, when a state of war arose between Russia and Japan. A copy of that instrument is inclosed. It is practically identic in terms with similar Proclamations issued from time to time for the last fifty years, but its provisions evoked an animated discussion in the "Times" newspaper in the winter of 1904 between Mr. Gibson Bowles, M.P., and Professor Holland, in the course of which the learned Professor characterized some of its phraseology as "misleading rhetoric," and strongly advocated its remodelling.

Sir Edward Grey is inclined to think that in certain portions the language may advantageously be amended to bring it into closer harmony with modern requirements and usage. The changes which he is disposed to think would attain this object are indicated in red ink* on p. 933 of the copy of the "London Gazette," which contains the last Proclamation, and I am to request that you will be so good as to take them into your consideration, and to favour Sir Edward Grey with your opinion as to whether they are such as may be properly submitted to the King for His Majesty's approval, should the need arise at any future time for the Secretary of State to advise His Majesty to issue a Proclamation of Neutrality.

I have, &c.

Proclamation of Neutrality, with amendments.

By the King.

A PROCLAMATION.

EDWARD, R. and I.

Whereas we are happily at peace with all Sovereigns, Powers, and States:

And whereas a state of war unhappily exists between His Majesty the Emperor of All the Russias and His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, and between their respective subjects, and others inhabiting within their countries, territories, or dominions:

And whereas we are on terms of friendship and amicable intercourse with each of these Powers, and with their several subjects, and others inhabiting within their countries, territories, or dominions:

And whereas great numbers of our loyal subjects reside and carry on commerce, and possess property and establishments, and enjoy various rights and privileges, within the dominions of each of the aforesaid Powers, protected by the faith of Treaties between us and each of the aforesaid Powers:

And whereas we, being desirous of preserving to our subjects the blessings of peace, which they now happily enjoy, are firmly purposed and determined to maintain a strict and impartial neutrality in the said state of war unhappily existing between the aforesaid Powers:

We therefore have thought fit, by and with the advice of our Privy Council, to issue this our Royal Proclamation:

And we do hereby strictly charge and command all our loving subjects to govern themselves accordingly, and to observe a strict neutrality in and during the aforesaid war, and to abstain from violating or contravening either the laws and statutes of the realm in this behalf, or the law of nations in relation thereto, as they will answer to the contrary at their peril:

And whereas in and by a certain Statute made and passed in a Session of Parliament holden in the 33rd and 34th year of the reign of Her late Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled "An Act to regulate the conduct of Her Majesty's subjects during the existence of hostilities between foreign States with which Her Majesty is at peace," it is, among other things, declared and enacted as follows:—

"This Act shall extend to all the dominions of Her Majesty, including the adjacent territorial waters.

"Illegal Enlistment.

"If any person, without the licence of Her Majesty, being a British subject, within or without Her Majesty's dominions, accepts or agrees to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any foreign State at war with any foreign State at peace with Her Majesty, and in this Act referred to as a friendly State, or whether a British subject or not, within Her Majesty's dominions, induces any other person to accept or agree to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any such foreign State as aforesaid—

"He shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment, or either of such punishments, at the discretion of the Court before which the offender is convicted; and imprisonment, if awarded, may be either with or without hard labour.

"If any person without the licence of Her Majesty, being a British subject, quits or goes on board any ship with a view to quitting Her Majesty's dominions, with intent to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any foreign State at war with a friendly State, or, whether a British subject or not, within Her Majesty's dominions, induces any other person to quit or to go on board any ship with a view of quitting Her Majesty's dominions with the like intent—

"He shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment, or either of such punishments, at the discretion of the Court before which the offender is convicted; and imprisonment, if awarded, may be either with or without hard labour.

"If any person induces any other person to quit Her Majesty's dominions or to embark on any ship within Her Majesty's dominions under a misrepresentation or false representation of the service in which such person is to be engaged, with the intent or in order that such person may accept or agree to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any foreign State at war with a friendly State—

"He shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment, or either of such punishments, at the discretion of the Court before which the offender is convicted; and imprisonment, if awarded, may be with or without hard labour.

"If the master or owner of any ship, without the licence of Her Majesty, knowingly either takes on board, or engages to take on board, or has on board such ship within Her Majesty's dominions any of the following persons in this Act referred to as illegally enlisted persons, that is to say:—

- "(1.) Any person who, being a British subject within or without the dominions of Her Majesty, has, without the licence of Her Majesty, accepted or agreed to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any foreign State at war with any friendly State;
- "(2.) Any person, being a British subject, who, without the licence of Her Majesty, is about to quit Her Majesty's dominions with intent to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any foreign State at war with a friendly State;
- "(3.) Any person who has been induced to embark under a misrepresentation or false representation of the service in which such person is to be engaged, with the intent or in order that such person may accept or agree to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any foreign State at war with a friendly State;

"Such master or owner shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and the following consequences shall ensue, that is to say:—

- "(1.) The offender shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment, or either of such punishments at the discretion of the Court before which the offender is convicted; and imprisonment, if awarded, may be either with or without hard labour; and
- "(2.) Such ship shall be detained until the trial and conviction or acquittal of the master or owner, and until all penalties inflicted on the master or owner have been paid, or the master or owner has given security for the payment of such penalties to the satisfaction of two Justices of the Peace, or other Magistrate or Magistrates having the authority of two Justices of the Peace; and
- "(3.) All illegally enlisted persons shall immediately on the discovery of the offence be taken on shore, and shall not be allowed to return to the ship.

"Illegal Shipbuilding and Illegal Expeditions."

"If any person within Her Majesty's dominions, without the licence of Her Majesty, does any of the following acts, that is to say:—

- "(1.) Builds or agrees to build, or causes to be built, any ship with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe, that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign State at war with any friendly State; or
- "(2.) Issues or delivers any commission for any ship with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign State at war with any friendly State; or
- "(3.) Equips any ship with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe, that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign State at war with any friendly State; or
- "(4.) Dispatches, or causes or allows to be dispatched, any ship with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign State at war with any friendly State;

"Such person shall be deemed to have committed an offence against this Act, and the following consequences shall ensue:—

- "(1.) The offender shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment, or either of such punishments, at the discretion of the Court before which the offender is convicted; and imprisonment, if awarded, may be either with or without hard labour;
- "(2.) The ship in respect of which any such offence is committed and her equipment shall be forfeited to Her Majesty;

"Provided that a person building, causing to be built, or equipping a ship in any of the cases aforesaid, in pursuance of a contract made before the commencement of such war as aforesaid, shall not be liable to any of the penalties imposed by this section in respect of such building or equipping if he satisfies the conditions following, that is to say:—

- "(1.) If forthwith, upon a Proclamation of Neutrality being issued by Her Majesty, he gives notice to the Secretary of State that he is so building, causing to be built, or equipping such ship, and furnishes such particulars of the contract and of any matters relating to, or done, or to be done under the contract as may be required by the Secretary of State;

- "(2.) If he gives such security, and takes and permits to be taken such other measures, if any, as the Secretary of State may prescribe for insuring that such ship shall not be dispatched, delivered, or removed without the licence of Her Majesty until the termination of such war as aforesaid.

"Where any ship is built by order of or on behalf of any foreign State when at war with a friendly State, or is delivered to or to the order of such foreign State, or any person who to the knowledge of the person building is an agent of such foreign State, or is paid for by such foreign State or such agent, and is employed in the military or naval service of such foreign State, such ship shall, until the contrary is proved, be deemed to have been built with a view to being so employed, and the burden shall lie on the builder of such ship of proving that he did not know that the ship was intended to be so employed in the military or naval service of such foreign State.

"If any person within the dominions of Her Majesty, and without the licence of Her Majesty—

"By adding to the number of the guns, or by changing those on board for other guns, or by the addition of any equipment for war, increases or augments, or procures to be increased or augmented, or is knowingly concerned in increasing or augmenting the warlike force of any ship which at the time of her being within the dominions of Her Majesty was a ship in the military or naval service of any foreign State at war with any friendly State—

"Such person shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment, or either of such punishments, at the discretion of the Court before which the offender is convicted; and imprisonment, if awarded, may be either with or without hard labour.

"If any person within the limits of Her Majesty's dominions, and without the licence of Her Majesty—

"Prepares or fits out any naval or military expedition to proceed against the dominions of any friendly State, the following consequences shall ensue:—

- "(1.) Every person engaged in such preparation or fitting out, or assisting therein, or employed in any capacity in such expedition, shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment, or either of such punishments, at the discretion of the Court before which the offender is convicted; and imprisonment, if awarded, may be either with or without hard labour;
- "(2.) All ships and their equipments, and all arms and munitions of war, used in or forming part of such expedition shall be forfeited to Her Majesty.

"Any person who aids, abets, counsels, or procures the commission of any offence against this Act shall be liable to be tried and punished as a principal offender."

And whereas by the said Act it is further provided that ships, built, commissioned, equipped, or dispatched in contravention of the said Act may be condemned and forfeited by judgment of the Court of Admiralty; and that if the Secretary of State or Chief Executive authority is satisfied that there is a reasonable and probable cause for believing that a ship within our dominions has been or is being built, commissioned, or equipped contrary to the said Act, and is about to be taken beyond the limits of such dominions, or that a ship is about to be dispatched contrary to the Act, such Secretary of State or Chief Executive authority shall have power to issue a warrant authorizing the seizure and search of such ship and her detention until she has been either condemned or released by process of law. And whereas certain powers of seizure and detention are conferred by the said Act on certain local authorities;

Now, in order that none of our subjects may unwarily render themselves liable to the penalties imposed by the said statute, we do hereby strictly command that no person or persons whatsoever do commit any act, matter, or thing whatsoever contrary to the provisions of the said statute, upon pain of the several penalties by the said statute imposed and of our high displeasure.

And we do hereby further warn and admonish all our loving subjects, and all persons whatsoever entitled to our protection, to observe towards each of the aforesaid Powers, their subjects and territories, and towards all belligerents whatsoever with whom we are at peace, the duties of neutrality; and to respect in all and each of them the exercise of belligerent rights.

And we hereby further warn all our loving subjects, and all persons whatsoever entitled to our protection, that if any of them shall presume, in contempt of this our Royal Proclamation, and of our high displeasure, to do any acts in derogation of their duty as subjects of a neutral Power in a war between other Powers, or in violation or contravention of the law of nations in that behalf, as more especially by breaking, or endeavouring to break, any blockade lawfully and actually established by or on behalf of either of the said Powers, or by carrying officers, soldiers, despatches, arms, ammunition, military stores or materials, or any article or articles considered and deemed to be contraband of war according to the law or modern usages of nations, for the use or service of either of the said Powers that all persons so offending, together with their ships and goods, will rightfully incur and be justly liable to hostile capture, and to the penalties denounced by the such law of nations in that behalf.

And we do hereby give notice that all our subjects and persons entitled to our protection who may misconduct themselves in the premises will do so at their peril, and of their own wrong; and that they will in no wise obtain any protection from us against such capture or such penalties as aforesaid, but will, on the contrary, incur our high displeasure by such misconduct.

Given at our Court at Buckingham Palace, this 11th day of February, in the year of Our Lord 1904, and in the 4th year of our reign.

GOD SAVE THE KING!

Sir Edward Grey to the Lord Chancellor.

SIR EDWARD GREY presents his compliments to the Lord Chancellor, and has the honour to transmit to his Lordship the inclosed printed reference to, and report of, His Majesty's Attorney- and Solicitor-General respecting the desirability of amending in certain particulars the phraseology which it is customary to employ in Proclamations of Neutrality issued by the Sovereign of these realms on the outbreak of hostilities between foreign States with which this country is at peace.

The Minutes contained in the annexed manuscript show the considerations which have given rise to the proposal so to amend any future Proclamation of this nature, and Sir E. Grey would be much obliged if the Lord Chancellor would be good enough to favour him with any observations which his Lordship may desire to make on the subject of the proposed changes.

The Lord Chancellor to Sir Edward Grey.

THE Lord Chancellor presents his compliments to Sir Edward Grey, and desires to say that he agrees with the Law Officers in their Report of the 2nd November last in regard to the terms in which His Majesty's Government may be advised to issue a Proclamation of Neutrality.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen, Foreign Office, February 17, 1908.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State, to transmit to you herewith the papers noted in the accompanying list, and to lay before you the following facts connected with a request made to His Majesty's Consul-General at Naples by Count Nicholas Androutzos, a Greek subject, for a declaration that, in contemplation of English law, nulla ostd to his marriage in Italy by the Italian civil authorities to Miss Seton, a British subject.

The circumstances of the case are shortly as follows:—

On the 16th November, 1892, Count Androutzos was married to Miss Isabella Fripp, a British subject, according to the rites of the Greek Church, in the Cathedral of Santa Maria dei Forestieri, at Corfu.

The British Consul was present at the ceremony, and registered it as a lex loci marriage in his Consular Register Book. It is not disputed that this marriage was a perfectly valid marriage in contemplation both of Greek and of English law.

Proposed marriage of Count Nicholas Androutzos. Question as to validity of his divorce.

The parties subsequently lived together, chiefly in Devonshire, until 1901, when in consequence of the husband's misconduct the wife filed a petition for judicial separation in the English Courts, which was granted on the 6th February, 1902.

Subsequently Count Androutzos instituted proceedings for divorce in the Greek Court at Athens, Greece being held by that Court to be at that time the marital domicile of the parties.

A decree of divorce was pronounced against Madame Androutzos in absentia and without, as is believed, previous notice having been given to her, and was made absolute on the 5th July, 1906.

Although Sir E. Grey sees no ground for questioning the validity of the decree of divorce in contemplation of Greek law, he is not at present satisfied that this decree would be recognized as valid by the Tribunals of this country. He is advised that a decree pronounced by the Court of a foreign country would probably not be treated and acted upon in England as valid if the proceedings offend against English views of substantial justice, and that this view is supported by dicta, to be found in the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of Pemberton v. Hughes (1899), L.R. 1 Ch., p. 781.

Sir Edward is in doubt whether this might not be held to be the case in the present instance, seeing that the decree of divorce pronounced against Madame Androutzos was granted in absentia and without her having received any notice to appear or opportunity of laying before the Greek Court facts—with regard to the already existing decree of judicial separation or otherwise—which might have appeared material to that Court.

I have the honour to request you to favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion—

1. Whether in the circumstances of the case the Greek decree of divorce would be recognized as valid, final, and conclusive by British Tribunals;

2. If your answer should be in the affirmative, whether having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the Secretary of State is bound to instruct His Majesty's Consul-General to issue his certificate that nulla ostd, or whether in any event sufficient doubt does not exist to render it undesirable that the Consul should issue a certificate which would in effect guarantee to the Italian Government, and would be by them treated as officially certifying, that the Greek decree of divorce would be recognized as valid by our Tribunals; and

3. Generally for any observations which you may be good enough to make upon the case, which appears to be one of considerable complexity.

I have, &c.

Report.

1. In our opinion the Greek Court was competent to grant the decree of divorce in question, and it is prima facie valid, but the British Courts would not hold themselves bound by it (at all events in proceedings initiated by Madame Androutzos), if it were proved that the Greek proceedings were not regularly conducted, and the decree were considered to be contrary to English notions of substantial justice. The question which the English Court would have to decide is one of fact, and cannot, in the circumstances of this case, be said to be free from doubt.

2. Having regard to the fact stated in the reference, that the certificate that nulla ostd would be treated by the Italian Government as officially certifying and guaranteeing that the Greek decree of divorce would be recognized as valid before our

Luxenburg arrested and badly treated when under detention as a political suspect.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, June 6, 1908.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit herewith, for your consideration, the papers noted in the accompanying list, relating to the case of Mr. N. Luxenburg, a naturalized British subject of German origin, born at Warsaw, who was arrested and detained by the Russian police authorities at Odessa in March last.

The main incidents in the case may be briefly summarized as follows:—

Mr. Luxenburg was arrested on the 8th March, and Mr. Smith, His Majesty's Consul-General at Odessa, reported (see Paper A) that his arrest had been effected by order of the Department of Police at St. Petersburg, for which reason the local authorities would not permit him to visit the prisoner (Paper C), and that the charge was that of "concealed criminal organization" (Paper B), or "privity in failing to report a criminal conspiracy" (Paper A).

Sir A. Nicolson, His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg, brought the case to the notice of the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, and suggested on the 12th March (Paper B) that it would be a kind act to allow the Consul-General to see the prisoner. On the 20th March, Mr. Smith was permitted to see Mr. Luxenburg (Paper E). He found Mr. Luxenburg, who had not yet been interrogated or informed of the charge, suffering from insomnia, want of appetite, and palpitations, brought on by anxiety and confinement. He was then sharing a cell with a student, having previously been two days in the police station and subsequently in the prison infirmary. He begged that his case might be investigated without further delay, and that he might be released on bail, which he was willing to find (Paper F).

Mr. Smith, in reporting on his visit to the gaol, called attention to the very faulty arrangements for the first reception of arrested persons at the police station (Paper E). And there would appear to be no doubt that those conditions contributed materially to impair Mr. Luxenburg's health, the state of which, on his return to England, was reported after a medical examination (Paper G) to be seriously affected.

Sir A. Nicolson was informed on the 22nd March that Mr. Luxenburg had been released; he was not, however, actually liberated until the morning of the 23rd of that month.

A letter from Mr. Luxenburg's solicitor puts forward (Paper H) a formal claim for 10,000*l.* compensation against the Russian Government, and gives a detailed account of his client's experiences during his detention.

The official Memorandum (Paper J), furnished by the Russian Government in reply to Sir A. Nicolson's representations, states the reasons for the claimant's arrest.

It had, in September last, come to the knowledge of the Department of Police that one Luxenburg was travelling through Russia ostensibly for purposes of business, but in reality with the object of carrying on revolutionary agitation. In consequence, Mr. Luxenburg was arrested on his arrival at Odessa—a town declared to be in a state of siege—by the local police, under paragraph 1, Article 23, of the Regulations for localities in a state of siege. By the terms of that law the competent authority can subject to a preventive detention, for a period not exceeding two weeks, any person suspected on reasonable grounds of either committing crimes against the State or of having been accessory to them, or of belonging to criminal associations.

The Memorandum states, in conclusion, that the necessity of identifying Luxenburg and of discovering whether he was the person wanted by the police entailed a certain delay, but that he was released before the expiration of the term of two weeks prescribed by Article 23 of the above-mentioned Regulations.

This document would make it appear that the case was one of "mistaken identity."

It may be remarked that Mr. Luxenburg is brother of Rosa Luxenburg, the well-known anarchist, who resides in Berlin, and that he stayed three days in that town immediately before entering Russian territory.

This fact may have aroused the suspicion of the Russian police.

Sir Edward Grey thought it advisable in the circumstances to consult the Secretary of State for the Home Department as to what course would, mutatis mutandis, be adopted in this country with regard to a similar case of mistaken arrest and detention of a foreigner whose health was alleged to have suffered in consequence.

Mr. Secretary Gladstone replied (Papers L and M) that compensation from public funds should not be considered due merely for a mistaken arrest, and that, if nothing but a mistake be alleged, compensation should neither be paid by His Majesty's Government to a foreigner arrested by mistake in England nor claimed on behalf of a British subject similarly arrested in another country. If compensation were given or claimed, it should only be on account of ill-treatment, of detention unduly prolonged, or of some other special circumstance.

Mr. Gladstone added that, having considered Mr. Luxenburg's case, he was inclined to think that some solatium might fairly be demanded, because of the treatment which he appeared to have received while in custody, particularly at the police station at Odessa, for the condition of which the Russian Government must be held responsible. He therefore suggested, while expressly disclaiming any idea that compensation was due for a mere mistake, that a moderate claim might be put forward on Mr. Luxenburg's behalf, based on the ill-usage he received and its consequences to him. This was desirable in the interests of any British subjects who might hereafter be arrested in Russia.

I am to request that you will take into your consideration the facts of the case, and that you will favour Sir Edward Grey with your opinion as to—

1. Whether, in the circumstances, His Majesty's Government ought to put forward on Mr. Luxenburg's behalf a claim for compensation as of right in respect of the treatment to which he was subjected, and, if so, on what special grounds such claim can, in your opinion, most advantageously be supported.

2. Whether, if the answer to the preceding question should be in the negative, His Majesty's Government should yet represent the case to the benevolent consideration of the Russian Government as one involving great hardship on an undoubtedly innocent British subject, and express the hope that that Government will see their way to offering Mr. Luxenburg an expression of regret and, as an act of grace, some moderate pecuniary solatium for the sufferings which he has undergone.

I am to ask that you will be so good as to furnish Sir Edward Grey with your reply at as early a date as may be convenient to you.

I have, &c.
(Signed) LOUIS MALLET.

P.S.—Since the above was written, a further letter, which is also inclosed herein (Paper N), from Mr. Luxenburg's solicitor has been received, calling in question certain statements made in the Russian official Memorandum of the case (Paper J.)

Report.

1. In the circumstances, we think that His Majesty's Government ought not to put forward on Mr. Luxenburg's behalf a claim for compensation as of right.

2. We think that the course suggested in this question is the proper one to adopt in the event of His Majesty's Government considering the present case a desirable one in which to make representations to the Russian Government. If such representations are made, the refusal to permit communication between the British Consul-General and Mr. Luxenburg should be made a cause of complaint.

War. Claim
on account of sinking of "Knight
Commander."

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list which relate to the proposal made by His Majesty's Government to the Russian Government to submit the case of the "Knight Commander" to arbitration.

With the concurrence of the then Law Officers (Sir J. Lawson Walton, Attorney-General, and Sir W. S. Robson, Solicitor-General), a despatch was addressed to His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg on the 13th September, 1906 (Paper (A)), proposing that the case should be submitted to arbitration at The Hague, but it will be seen from the inclosed despatch from His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg (Paper (B)) that the Russian Government decline to accede to this proposal on two grounds:—

1. That there is no generally recognized principle of international law which forbids the sinking of neutral prizes; and

2. That it would be derogatory to the sovereign rights of Russia to submit decisions of her Prize Courts to revision by an ulterior Tribunal.

His Majesty's Government, while recognizing that, since this refusal is couched in such definite terms, it is impossible to reiterate the request for the settlement of the question in this manner, feel that the contentions put forward by the Russian Government cannot be allowed to pass unchallenged, and I am accordingly to inclose the draft of a despatch to His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg (Paper (C)) setting forth the views of His Majesty's Government in the matter, and to request that, in taking these papers into your consideration, you will favour the Secretary of State with your opinion as to whether the terms of the draft despatch are such as can properly be addressed to the Russian Government. Sir E. Grey would at the same time be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general character which you may desire to offer upon the papers now submitted to you.

Draft of Despatch from Sir Edward Grey to Mr. O'Beirne.

(No. . Treaty.)
Sir,

Foreign Office, June . 1908.

His Majesty's Government have had under their careful consideration your despatch No. 22, Treaty, of the 23rd April last, inclosing a note from the Russian Government, in which the latter decline the proposal made by His Majesty's Government that the sinking of the steamship "Knight Commander" should be referred to arbitration.

The reply of the Russian Government is based upon two main arguments:—

1. That there is no generally recognized principle of international law which forbids the sinking of neutral prizes; and

2. That it would be derogatory to the sovereign rights of Russia to submit decisions of her Prize Courts to revision by an ulterior Tribunal.

As regards the first argument, His Majesty's Government maintain the view that it is not incumbent upon them to prove that Russia, when a belligerent, is not entitled to sink neutral British prizes, but that, on the contrary, it is incumbent upon Russia, in such circumstances, to establish that she is, in fact by virtue of the generally recognized principles of international law, entitled to do so. International law is founded on the practice of nations, and it is not possible for His Majesty's Government to prove conclusively that the sinking of neutral prizes is forbidden by international law, because hitherto no nation has attempted to act on, or claimed any such right, and, consequently, there is no international practice in the matter, and hitherto no nation has claimed or has attempted to act on any suggested right of destroying neutral prizes. Consequently no practice of nations exists which can justify such an interference with the rights of neutrals. According to the practice of nations, certain acts of interference by belligerents with neutrals are acquiesced in by the latter; but if the principle were conceded that a neutral Power is compelled to submit to any hostile act on the part of a belligerent, unless it can be proved that such act is forbidden by international law, the extraordinary result would follow that any belligerent act, however outrageous, with respect to a neutral, would be legitimate by the mere fact of its being entirely novel.

In the view of His Majesty's Government, the discussion and votes taken at the recent Second Peace Conference, to which allusion is made in the Russian note, have no material bearing upon the present question. The propositions there discussed were of a legislative character—designed to lay down a law for the future—not declaring what the present state of the law is, and though speakers on both sides may have appealed to the practice, discussions and decisions of the past as arguments in favour of adopting these propositions as the law of the future, His Majesty's Government consider that the remarks made by M. Renault, one of the French Delegates, at the meeting of the Fourth Commission on the 7th August, 1907, state the correct position very clearly. They were as follows:—

"Le rôle de la Commission n'est pas de se prononcer sur le droit existant, de trancher ses controverses, ou de donner des consultations. Elle doit rechercher les règles à poser pour l'avenir."

The second argument advanced by the Russian Government is that, pending the creation of an International Prize Court of Appeal, it would be derogatory to their sovereign rights to submit the decision of their Supreme Prize Court to international review.

His Majesty's Government do not desire to contest the principle that every State has an undoubted right to determine what it deems to be consistent with its dignity and sovereign rights, but they nevertheless feel justified in observing that there are ample precedents to show that there is nothing derogatory to the dignity of a nation in the review by an International Tribunal of the decisions rendered by its highest legal Tribunals. To take but one example, no Court enjoys a higher reputation for impartiality and learning than the Supreme Court at Washington; nevertheless the United States Government consented, under Article 12 of the Treaty of Washington of 1871, to submit all British claims to an International Commission, and as a consequence a large number of claims were dealt with and settled, despite the fact that many of these cases had already been decided by the Supreme Court.

from "Moore's Digest of International Law" (vol. vii, p. 651), which is in entire harmony with their own views:—

"The principle that the decisions of Prize Courts are not internationally conclusive as to the doctrines applied, and that a claimant injured by a wrongful decision may seek indemnity through the action of his Government, is no longer open to question. The right to indemnity in such cases was demonstrated in the remarkable opinion delivered by W. Pinkney, as one of the Commissioners under the Jay Treaty, under which large amounts were paid by the British Government to citizens of the United States as indemnity for captures and condemnations under Orders in Council violative of the rights of neutral trade. Similar indemnities were obtained from France for wrongful captures and condemnations during the Napoleonic wars, as well as from Spain, Naples, and Denmark. In the case of Denmark the question of the international finality of prize sentences gave rise to a long discussion which was conducted on the part of the United States by Henry Wheaton, as Minister to Denmark."

In view of the doctrine above cited, His Majesty's Government fail to see that it would be derogatory to the dignity of Russia to pursue the same course as that followed in the past by Great Britain, France, the United States of America, Spain, Naples, and Denmark.

His Majesty's Government do not deny that the Supreme Prize Court at St. Petersburg, in deciding the appeal in the case of the "Knight Commander," correctly interpreted the Russian Naval Prize Regulations. The real point, however, which His Majesty's Government desired to submit to the impartial decision of an Arbitration Tribunal, was whether these Regulations were consistent with the principles of international law, a question which was admittedly outside the scope of the functions of the Supreme Prize Court.

For the above reasons, therefore, His Majesty's Government can only express their regret at the refusal of the Russian Government to submit the case of the "Knight Commander" to arbitration. His Majesty's Government earnestly desired to have the justice of their cause established in the manner best conforming to their anxiety to settle all controversies of this kind, more particularly with the Russian Government, in an amicable manner. But the principle of international law, for which they contend is of paramount importance to all neutral Powers, so much so that His Majesty's Government cannot in any circumstances consent to abandon it. In the vindication of that principle they have carefully refrained from all action calculated to create embarrassment, in the confident belief that the equity of their claim would ultimately be admitted as a consequence of the resort to the methods of friendly representation and judicial adjudication. But the Russian Government, in their note, refuse arbitration in such definite terms that His Majesty's Government feel that they cannot reiterate their request for a settlement of the question in this manner, and in the circumstances, as these channels are to be closed to them, they will be compelled, if in future the rights of His Majesty's subjects as neutrals should again be challenged, to rely on their own resources to insure their being respected.

His Majesty's Government take note of the statement in the concluding paragraph of M. Isvolsky's note, that it is competent for the parties interested in such portion of the cargo on board the "Knight Commander" as was unaffected by the judgment of the Supreme Court to present their claims in a Port Prize Court, and it is understood that steps are being taken with this object, which His Majesty's Government trust may be attended with satisfactory results. In this connection, however, they observe with some surprise and concern that, in a judgment recently delivered by the Prize Court at Liban in the case of the "Princesse Marie," in which important British interests are involved, the claims of the owners of all the cargo, whether innocent or contraband, have been rejected. His Majesty's Government do not desire to say more on this point at present, as they understand the finding is forming the subject of appeal to the Supreme Prize Court at St. Petersburg.

You will read this despatch to M. Isvolsky, and leave with him a copy of it.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 10, 1908.

Railway loan to Siam from Malay
States.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to transmit to you herewith the accompanying papers, which relate to the question of a loan from the Government of the Federated Malay States for the construction of a railway by the Railway Department of the Kingdom of Siam in Siamese territory in the Malay States. This railway and the loan requisite for its construction form part of negotiations which are now proceeding between His Majesty's Government and that of the King of Siam for a Treaty which contemplates, inter alia, a partial surrender by Great Britain of her extra-territorial jurisdiction in return for a cession of territory and for the grant of the right, not hitherto possessed by British subjects, of holding land in Siam, and certain other minor matters.

Article IV of the draft Treaty (page 11, Paper (A)) states that "The Federated Malay States will make a loan to the Siamese Railway Department of a sum of money for the purpose of constructing a railway in the Siamese territory in the Malay Peninsula. The terms and conditions of this loan are set forth in a separate Agreement bearing even date with this Treaty."

The draft separate Agreement above referred to will be found on page 30 of the same Paper (A). Under Article VIII of that Agreement it will be observed that the Railway Department of the Kingdom of Siam pledges as security for the repayment of the principal and interest of the loan sections of the railway as they are successively constructed.

The question has now arisen (see Mr. Paget's telegram No. 10 of the 31st ultimo to Sir E. Grey, Paper (B)) as to whether a provision attached to loans raised by the Siamese Government in 1905 and 1907 is applicable to the loan projected for the railway provided for by the draft Treaty. The prospectuses of these loans are Papers (C) and (D), attached to this letter. The provision referred to is to the effect that "it is understood and agreed that if any special security should be given to any other foreign loan contracted in future by the Royal Siamese Government, such security would also be immediately applicable to and concurrent with the present loan."

His Majesty's Minister at Bangkok, Mr. Paget, states that the late Mr. Strobel, General Adviser to the Siamese Government, was of opinion that this provision would not apply to such a loan as Siam now proposes to raise from the Federated Malay States, which is a special loan raised for a special purpose, the security for which will consist in the railway to which the proceeds are to be devoted.

The Governor of the Straits Settlements, Sir J. Anderson, shares the opinion of the late Mr. Strobel, but considers that some declaration should be made on the point as public notice to those concerned, and Mr. Paget has requested to be furnished with instructions in the matter.

The Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury have been consulted on the subject, and it will be seen from their letter of the 7th instant (Paper (E)) that their Lordships find nothing in the provision of the loans of 1905 and 1907 to justify the inference that it would not apply to works which form the security for borrowed money expended upon them, and they consider that the undertaking of the Siamese Government as set out in those loan Agreements applies absolutely to any special security given for any new foreign loan.

In view of the negotiations now pending, it is very desirable to furnish Mr. Paget with instructions on the point as soon as possible, and Sir E. Grey would accordingly be glad if you would take the papers inclosed into your consideration and favour him at your earliest convenience with your opinion whether His Majesty's Government would in any way be interfering with the security of the bondholders of the Siamese Government Loans of 1905 and 1907 by appropriating part of it to the exclusive service of a subsequent loan, i.e., the loan contemplated in the draft Treaty now under consideration.

Sir E. Grey would also be glad to be furnished with any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer on the papers now submitted to you.

SIAM—ZANZIBAR.

[13024]

Report.

In our opinion the proposed appropriation of the railway in question to the exclusive service of the contemplated loan is inconsistent with the pledge or undertaking given by the Siamese Government to the bondholders of the loans of 1905 and 1907.

The effect of that undertaking appears to be that if any security is given to a subsequent foreign loan, such security shall also be available for the loans of 1905 and 1907, even though it may owe its existence to a subsequent loan for which it is security. It is improbable that this was contemplated by the Siamese Government as a result of the undertaking contained in the prospectuses, but the words of the undertaking are very wide, and they must be construed in the sense in which they would naturally be read by those who are invited to act upon them.

Council: relative to Judiciary.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 7, 1908.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you herewith the accompanying draft Order in Council for Zanzibar.

In consequence of the decision of His Majesty's Government to abolish the Court of Appeal for East Africa in Zanzibar as established by "The Eastern African Protectorates (Court of Appeal) Order in Council, 1902," and to substitute a Court of Appeal on the mainland, Sir E. Grey proposes to reduce the number of the Judges in the British Court in Zanzibar to two. As the work of the British Court will in all probability entail more work than two Judges can undertake, it has been decided to appoint a second Magistrate, and at the same time to extend the jurisdiction of the Magistrate as defined by Article 16 (4) of "The Zanzibar Order in Council, 1906," so as to enable him to take cognizance not only of cases in which natives of Africa are concerned, but of all Magisterial cases, whatever may be the nationality of the accused. The draft Order in Council has therefore been designed with this object, and Sir E. Grey will be glad if you will take it into your consideration and will favour him with your opinion as to whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

Copies of "The Eastern African Protectorates (Court of Appeal) Order in Council, 1902," and "The Zanzibar Order in Council, 1906," and "The Zanzibar Order in Council, 1906 (No. 2)," are inclosed herewith for convenience of reference.

convicted of publishing certain articles of a seditious nature in Corea, and the experiences of that trial convinced Sir E. Grey that certain amendments were required in the provisions of the Orders in Council of 1904 and 1907 relating to the trial and punishment of persons for this offence. The amendments introduced by the accompanying draft Order in Council are, firstly, that deportation may be ordered on conviction for a first offence, and not merely on failure to give security to be of good behaviour or on a further conviction; secondly, under sub-article (4), the trial only, and not the whole of the proceedings in the case, must take place before the Supreme Court; thirdly, power is given to the judge to order trial without jury.

Clause 3 of the draft Order in Council has been inserted to enable certain disciplinary powers to be conferred upon the officer in command of the Shanghai Municipal Police Force. This force is recruited from British Indian subjects and is commanded by a British subject, and experience has shown that power to administer certain minor punishments must be conferred upon him in order to enable him to maintain proper discipline.

The draft Order has been shown to and concurred in by Sir H. de Sausmarez, the Judge of the Supreme Court at Shanghai. The Secretary of State for India has also been consulted with regard to Clause 3 and concurs in its terms.

I am to request that you will take the draft Order into your consideration, and will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to whether its terms are right and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

Foreign Office to His Majesty's Attorney-General and Solicitor-General.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, January 16, 1909.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to inclose, for your consideration, the papers noted in the accompanying list respecting the duties which should be observed by this country as a neutral when hostilities are in progress between other States.

I am in the first place to invite your attention to the terms of Article 8 of a Convention signed by the British Plenipotentiaries to the recent Second Peace Conference (subject to reservations as regards Articles 19 and 23) respecting the rights and duties of neutral Powers in maritime war. The Article in question is printed on p. 119 of Paper (A).†

In the spring of last year an Inter-Departmental Committee was appointed, under the presidency of the King's Proctor, the Earl of Desart, K.C.B., to consider the various Conventions which had resulted from the labours of the Conference at The Hague in 1907, and to advise His Majesty's Government as to their acceptance, they having been with one exception—viz., the Convention which relates to the creation of an International Court of Appeal in prize matters—left open for signature down to the end of last June. The Report of that Committee on the Convention concerning the "Rights and Duties of Neutral Powers in Maritime War" is herewith inclosed (Paper (B)), and I am to draw your especial attention to paragraphs 18–22 of that Report, in which the bearing of the rule of neutrality as embodied in Article 8 of the Convention with the existing Municipal Law in the British dominions is discussed.

The Law in question is "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870," 33 & 34 Vict., cap. 90, of which a copy is inclosed (Paper (D)). You will observe that, in the opinion of the Inter-Departmental Committee, the provisions of section 8 (4) of this enactment go considerably beyond the requirements of the 8th Article of the Convention, and operate detrimentally to the interests of British shipping, inasmuch as they forbid the dispatch of an ordinary British merchant-vessel from British territory for employment in the service of a belligerent, while the comparative leniency of the provisions of the Municipal Laws of other nations admits in the like circumstances of the sale and dispatch unchecked to belligerents of vessels of their respective mercantile marines.

This condition of things was turned to considerable advantage by the subjects of certain neutral foreign Powers during the hostilities between Russia and Japan, when, for instance, several vessels of the Hamburg-American line were sold to the Russian Government and utilized by them as cruisers or transports.

* The Law Officers approved the Order in Council without introducing any alterations. The text is contained in the "London Gazette" of the 3rd December, 1909 [Conf. No. 9549*].

Rights of neutrality Proposed amendment of 33 and 34 Vic.,
cap. 90, sec.
8 (4), to safeguard.

The Committee were accordingly of opinion that it is desirable that the section in question should be amended in such a manner as to make it applicable only to vessels which have been wholly or partially adapted for warlike purposes within His Majesty's dominions.

The Inter-Departmental Committee was recently reconvened to consider a Bill which has been prepared by Parliamentary Counsel to effect the legislation which it is deemed desirable to enact before the King's ratifications of such of The Hague Conventions as necessitate fresh legislation are deposited at The Hague. None of these instruments has, as yet, been ratified. I am, in this connection, to inclose a copy of the Minutes of the proceedings of the Committee at their meeting on the 5th instant, from which you will observe that they earnestly renew their recommendation that section 8 (4) of "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870," should be amended in order to get rid of the discrepancy above alluded to (Paper (C)).

Sir Edward Grey presumes that if it is eventually decided to take steps in this direction the Bill for that purpose would, as in 1870, be introduced by His Majesty's Attorney-General.

I am accordingly to request that you will be good enough to take these papers into your consideration and to favour Sir Edward Grey, at your early convenience, with your opinion as to the desirability of amending section 8 (4) of "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870," with a view to meet the recommendations of the Inter-Departmental Committee, and at the same time to favour him with any general observations you may think well to offer on the subject.

Report.

WE are of opinion that section 8, sub-section 4, of "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870," imposes a wider obligation on British subjects than the obligation defined in Article 8 of The Hague Convention respecting the rights and duties of neutral Powers in maritime war. That Article prohibits the departure from the jurisdiction concerned of such vessels, and of such vessels only, as have been adapted wholly or partly within the jurisdiction for use in war; whereas the sub-section prohibits the dispatch of any vessels whatever with the intent or knowledge that the same may be employed in the military or naval service of a belligerent. It seems desirable that the sub-section should be amended so as to accord with the Convention.

Generally.—We observe that the Inter-Departmental Committee founded their recommendation as to the amendment of sub-section 4 of section 8 of the Foreign Enlistment Act on the desirability of enabling British shipping to share in the remunerative employment by a belligerent that is open to the mercantile marine of other nations. If full effect is to be given to this consideration, section 8 of the Foreign Enlistment Act should be repealed and recast in a form which goes no further than Article 8 of the Convention. At present sub-section 1 of the section (prohibiting the building of any ship for military or naval use by a belligerent) goes beyond the Convention, which does not deal with the case of building at all. We think also that, on a fair construction of the Article, it does not go so far as sub-section 3 of the section. That sub-section forbids the equipment of any vessel for use in the military or naval service of a belligerent; and "equipment" is defined in section 30 of the Act to include the furnishing of a ship with any stores or anything for the purpose of adapting her for sea, whereas the word "equipment" in the Convention appears to be limited to the equipment of a vessel for military purposes. There is no express definition or interpretation of the word "l'équipement" or "fitting out" in the Convention, but as the prohibition against the departure of the vessel is limited to such vessels only as have been wholly or partly adapted for use in war, we think that the words "fitting out" must mean fitting out for use in war, or the prohibition of departure would apply to some and not all the offending vessels.

ARTICLE 8.

Un Gouvernement neutre est tenu d'user des moyens dont il dispose pour empêcher dans sa juridiction l'équipement ou l'armement de tout navire qu'il a des motifs raisonnables de croire destiné à croiser ou à concourir à des opérations hostiles contre une Puissance avec laquelle il est en paix. Il est aussi tenu d'user de la même surveillance pour empêcher le départ hors de sa juridiction de tout navire destiné à croiser ou à concourir à des opérations hostiles, et qui aurait été, dans la dite juridiction, adapté en tout ou en partie à des usages de guerre.

ARTICLE 8.

A neutral Government is bound to employ the means at its disposal to prevent the fitting out or arming of any vessel within its jurisdiction which it has reason to believe is intended to cruise, or engage in hostile operations, against a Power with which that Government is at peace. It is also bound to display the same vigilance to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or engage in hostile operations which has been adapted entirely or partly within the said jurisdiction for use in war.

[Registrar-General.]

General Register Office to Treasury.*

General Register Office, Somerset House,
London, February 18, 1909.

Sir,

ON the 6th October, 1903, Walter Carl Johann Steinmann, a German subject, was married at the St. Giles' Register Office to Gisela Reiter, otherwise known as Grace Roosevelt, apparently an Austrian subject, she having been born at Vienna in 1880. A copy of the entry of the marriage is appended, from which it will be seen that the man gave his age as 21 years. It appears, however, that his true age was 18 years, and that he should therefore have obtained the consent of his parents to the marriage. On these grounds, viz., that he was only 18 years of age and that the consent of his father had not been obtained, a decree of nullity of the marriage was pronounced by the High Court at Cologne on the 26th March, 1904.

Mrs. Steinmann now wishes to remarry in England, and the question whether notice of her proposed marriage (to Mr. Ernest E. James) may be accepted by the Superintendent Registrar of Westminster has been submitted to me for decision. Such notice would be given under the Act 19 & 20 Vict., cap. 119, and would include a declaration to the effect that "there is no lawful hindrance to the said marriage."

I have caused the parties to be informed that before deciding whether I can authorize the Superintendent Registrar of Westminster district to accept a notice and grant a licence for their marriage I have considered it necessary to seek the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown.

The case has many features in common with that of Ogden v. Ogden, respecting which judgment was given in the Court of Appeal on the 18th November, 1907, but differs from it in one important particular. In that case Leon Philip, a French citizen by birth and domicile, had married Sarah Helen Williams at Prestwich, the marriage being without the knowledge or consent of his father. This marriage was declared by the French Court to be null and void on the ground that at the time of the marriage Leon Philip was under the age (25 years according to the French Code) at which he could lawfully marry without the consent of his parents, and that such consent had not been given. The wife then applied to the Divorce Court for a decree of divorce, but the then President dismissed the Petition on the ground that, both the parties being domiciled French people, the Court had no jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage. The wife then married William Henry Ogden, who, having later ascertained the facts as to his wife's previous marriage, petitioned for a decree of nullity on the ground that, according to English law, she was still the wife of Leon Philip. Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane held that the first marriage was valid in England, and that the Court had not to consider the effect of the French decree at all, and granted the decree of nullity accordingly. This decision was upheld by the Court of Appeal.

Validity of mixed marriages in England declared null and void by foreign Courts.

* Communicated by the Registrar-General, April 29 1909.

GENERAL.

In the present case the woman is an Austrian by birth, whereas in the Ogden case the woman was a British subject by birth, and it nowhere appears in the judgment of the Court of Appeal (so far as I have been able to ascertain from the "Times" report) whether that decision was in any way dependent upon the original nationality of the woman. But for this difference in the circumstances I should have had no hesitation in withholding permission for the marriage to take place, on the ground that the Court of Appeal had decided that a marriage solemnized in England still holds good in England, although it has been declared null and void by the Court of the country to which one of the parties belongs.

I have therefore to request that the foregoing facts may be placed before the Law Officers of the Crown, and that I may be favoured with their Opinion whether, having regard to the fact that Mrs. Steinmann's marriage in England with Mr. Walter Carl Johann Steinmann has been declared null and void by a German Court of Law having jurisdiction in respect of the aforesaid Mrs. Steinmann—

1. Mrs. Steinmann can legally and lawfully contract another marriage in England either with a British or foreign subject; or
2. Whether the annulment of her marriage by the German Court of Law is inoperative in England, and whether she is consequently debarred from legally contracting another marriage in England.

I am, &c.
(Signed) W^m. C. DUNBAR,
Registrar-General.

The above letter having been submitted to the Law Officers, they furnished the following Opinion in reply:—

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

We are of opinion that the marriage between Steinmann and Mrs. Steinmann which took place at St. Giles' Registry Office on the 6th October, 1903, was valid according to the law of this country, and that in this country it remains valid notwithstanding the decree in the High Court at Cologne. Accordingly we think that the Registrar-General may properly decline to authorize the Superintendent Registrar of Westminster to grant a licence for the marriage of Mrs. Steinmann and Mr. James.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, June 12, 1909.

Consular Certificates of Death;
Bank of England's views as to.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to submit to you the following facts in connection with the issue of death certificates by His Majesty's Consular Officers abroad.

In July last the attention of Sir E. Grey was drawn to a case in which the London and Westminster Bank refused to accept as proof of death a certificate issued by His Majesty's Consul at Jerusalem. The Bank did, however, accept as proof a certificate issued by the clergyman who officiated at the burial of the deceased person, the signature of this gentleman being verified by the Consul.

On enquiry being made as to the reason of this refusal, the Manager of the Bank replied that their practice with regard to proving the death of a stockholder dying abroad was in accordance with the regulations of the Bank of England.

GENERAL.

In a correspondence which arose in 1902 on a similar point the Bank of England stated their position as follows:—

"Foreign certificates of death, the signature to which is authenticated by a British Consul, are accepted by the Bank. What the Bank understand by the term used in their Memorandum, 'British Consul's certificate of death,' is a certificate founded not on the ordinary official evidence of the country, but on evidence of the nature of an allegation which may reach the Consular officer."

Certificates of this nature the Bank did not feel justified in accepting.

Sir E. Grey was advised that it was desirable to reopen the matter, and a letter was accordingly addressed to the Bank of England pointing out that it appeared to be somewhat unreasonable that Consular certificates should not be accepted as evidence of death, the more so as registration of deaths by a Consular officer is carried out under the provisions of section 11 of "The Naturalisation Act, 1870," and by section 12 (4) of the same Act it is provided that "the copies of such entries shall be evidence of any matters by this Act or by any regulation of the said Secretary of State authorized to be inserted in the register."

The Bank of England replied that, after careful consideration of the matter, they considered that the only safe course open to them was that of continuing to exercise the discretionary powers vested in them by section 24 of "The National Debt Act, 1870," and maintaining their present practice of the non-acceptance of Consular certificates of death.

In view of the Bank of England's opinion that they could not accept the certificates as at present issued, it appeared to Sir E. Grey that the simplest course would be to alter the instructions issued to Consular officers so as to enable the certificates to be issued in a form which would be acceptable to the bank.

On being requested to indicate what alterations in the regulations would produce the desired effect, the Bank replied that the only alteration which would be of real value, from their point of view, would be to require the Consul to obtain documentary evidence of death or burial in accordance with the law of the country before making an entry in his register of the death of a British subject who died in his district. The certificate issued should, it was suggested, be so altered as to bear on its face a statement of the nature of the evidence of death furnished to him when registration was effected. The Bank further proposed that the authorities at Somerset House should issue sealed copies of Consular certificates of death, instead of plain copies as at present.

These proposals were referred to the Registrar-General, who expressed the opinion that, as the certificates in question are not registered under the Registration Acts, but under instructions issued by this Department, he could not legally affix the seal of his office to certified copies of such records.

The matter was next referred to certain of His Majesty's Consular officers, who were requested to suggest what alterations in the regulations would be advisable.

From the considerations put forward by these officers it became obvious that it would be necessary to make some distinction between certificates issued in civilised countries and those issued in uncivilised or partly civilised countries.

In countries of the former class, where registration of deaths before the local authority is compulsory, it would be possible for the Consular officer to require the production of documentary evidence of death or burial in accordance with the law of the country, and a column could be provided in the form of the certificate for the purpose of recording the production of such evidence. In "uncivilised" countries, where the registration of death is either not required by law or is imperfectly carried out, it was suggested that before issuing a certificate the Consular officer should require two persons known to him (but not necessarily of British nationality) to appear before him and declare that the death had taken place. A medical certificate would be added, if possible, and the declaration might, if necessary, be made on oath. This procedure, it may be noted, is that adopted by German officers in accordance with German law, which, however, does not require the declaration to be made on oath.

The Bank of England was then asked whether they would be able to accept certificates issued on the lines indicated above.

The Bank replied that certificates issued as proposed in the case of civilised would probably meet their requirements, but that in uncivilised countries it did not appear that the declaration of two persons known to the Consul would meet the Bank's requirements, even in cases where medical certificates were available.

It was, however, stated that the Bank would be prepared to accept both classes of certificates without distinction if a short Act were passed giving them protection similar to that afforded by section 78 of "The Probate Act, 1857," 20 & 21 Vic., cap. 77, in which it is provided that "all persons and corporations making or permitting to be made any payment or transfer bond fide upon any probate or letters of administration granted in respect of the estate of any deceased person under the authority of this Act shall be indemnified and protected in so doing, notwithstanding any defect or circumstance whatsoever affecting the validity of such probate or letters of administration."

It was further suggested that in this Act a section should be inserted enabling the Registrar-General to issue copies of Consular certificates of death under seal. Unless such a section were inserted the Bank could not accept the Registrar's copies of Consular certificates of death, but they would be compelled, in all cases, to call for a copy issued by the Consul himself under seal.

The Registrar-General has been consulted on this last proposal, and has stated that he has no objection to issuing under the seal of the General Register Office copies of the Consular records which are deposited there.

In view of the extent and expense of His Majesty's Consular Service, Sir E. Grey is of opinion that Consular officers should be enabled to render as large duties as possible. At present the certificates which they are entitled to issue do not appear to enjoy the authority which it is fitting and convenient that they should possess, and I am therefore to enquire whether you see any objection from the legal point of view to the enactment of such a measure as the Bank of England suggest; and, if not, whether you consider its enactment desirable.

Sir Edward Grey would also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general character which you may have to offer upon the matter.

I have, &c.

W. LANGLEY.

Report.

In our opinion, there is no objection, from a legal point of view, to such a measure as the Bank of England suggest, and its enactment in regard to certificates issued in civilised countries would appear to be desirable. As regards uncivilised countries, we do not think that a mere certificate by the Consul that two persons known to him have declared that the death has taken place (even if such declaration were made on oath) would be satisfactory.

We think that in regard to such certificates the Act should contain stringent provisions for the purpose of securing that the Consul shall make proper enquiry into the character and extent of the declarants' knowledge of the death, and that the certificate should record that these enquiries have been made, and that the Consul has satisfied himself that the declarations are true.

tions Bill.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit to you the draft of a Bill (Paper A) which has been prepared to give full effect to the legislation which is desirable in the case of certain of the conventions agreed to at the Second Peace Conference held at The Hague in 1907, before they are ratified by the King.

The notes on the clauses of the Bill (Paper B) will explain in what respect legislation is required as regards the specific conventions therein referred to, copies of which are also enclosed (Paper C) for convenience of reference.

The draft Bill has been referred to the various departments of His Majesty's Government concerned, who have concurred in its terms, with the exception of the Foreign Office, May 19, 1909.

I am to request that you will take the draft Bill into your consideration, and that you will be so good as to favour the Secretary of State with your opinion as to whether, in its present form, it may properly be introduced into Parliament.

Sir Edward would also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general nature which you may desire to offer upon the draft Bill.

Report.

We have carefully considered the draft Bill and in our opinion, subject to the following observations, it may properly be introduced into Parliament.

1. Clause 1 (1) (i) appears to suggest that a Secretary of State has power to compel the attendance of witnesses before the tribunal when sitting at a place without His Majesty's dominions, but under the clause he only has the power of the court, and no court in this country has the power to compel the attendance of witnesses out of its jurisdiction. If it is intended to give a Secretary of State such power it should be done in express language. We do not, however, suggest that it would be desirable to confer so unusual a power on the Secretary of State; and, unless it is intended to confer it, the language of the clause should be altered so as to avoid the suggestion that any such power is in fact conferred.

2. In clause 1 (2) we think that the privileges conferred on members of an international tribunal should extend only to members being in His Majesty's dominions while in the performance of their duty.

3. The convention respecting the rights and duties of neutral Powers in time of war appears to imply that belligerent war-ships should be entitled to execute repairs and to revictual, subject to the limitations imposed by articles 17 and 19. To repair or revictual a belligerent war-ship if there exists a reasonable cause to believe that the same will be employed in the military or naval service of the belligerent would be an offence against section 8 of "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870," and if it is intended to give full effect to the convention express enactment is necessary to enable a belligerent war-ship to repair or revictual as therein contemplated.

4. The draft Bill does not give power to His Majesty to perform the obligation imposed by the second paragraph of article 9 of the convention respecting the rights and duties of neutral Powers and persons in war on land. That paragraph provides that the neutral Power shall see that any restrictions or prohibitions which it may enact in regard to the use by belligerents of telegraph or telephone calls, or wireless telegraphy apparatus belonging to companies or to private individuals shall be impartially observed by the owners of such telegraph or telephone calls or wireless telegraphy apparatus.

2.—(1.) Without prejudice to any other powers exercisable by His Majesty for the purpose of enforcing the obligations of neutrality, His Majesty may by order in council—

- (a.) Make regulations for preventing, prohibiting, or restricting the supply of fuel or stores to, and the repairing or manning of, ships belonging to any foreign State at war with any other foreign State at peace with His Majesty (in this Act referred to as a friendly State);
- (b.) Authorise the arrest and detention of any persons forming part of the crew of any ship belonging to, or of the forces of, any foreign State at war with any friendly State whom His Majesty by virtue of any treaty, convention, or otherwise is under an obligation to intern;
- (c.) Prohibit the erection by or on behalf of any foreign State at war with any friendly State, of any wireless telegraphic station or any apparatus for the purpose of communicating with their forces on land or sea and the use of any such station or apparatus established by any such State for purely military purposes before the commencement of the war and not previously opened for the service of public messages; and the order may contain such incidental, consequential, and supplemental provisions as may appear to His Majesty to be necessary or proper for the purposes of the order, and any such order may be revoked and varied by any subsequent order in council.

(2.) If any person contravenes the provisions of any such order or obstructs any officer in the execution of his duties thereunder he shall be guilty of an offence under the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, and shall be liable to be proceeded against and punished as if he had been guilty of increasing the warlike force of a foreign ship under section 10 of that Act.

Vict. c. 90.

(3.) An order in council under this section shall, if made before the outbreak of hostilities between two foreign States, come into force on the issue of a proclamation of neutrality by His Majesty in connection with such outbreak, and if made during such hostilities, come into force on the making thereof, and in either case shall, unless previously revoked, continue in force until the issue of a proclamation declaring such hostilities to be at an end, and whilst in force shall have effect as if enacted in this Act:

Provided that the issue of such last-mentioned proclamation shall not affect any legal proceeding commenced or offence committed whilst the order in council was still in force, but any such legal proceeding may be continued, and any such offence prosecuted as if the order remained in force.

3.—(1.) A British vessel other than a hospital-ship, or a boat of a hospital-ship belonging thereto, shall not be painted white outside with a broad horizontal band of red or green so as to resemble such a ship or boat, and if any such vessel is so painted the owner or master of the vessel shall be liable to a fine not exceeding 100*l.*, and on a certificate from a surveyor of ships or a Board of Trade inspector under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, that a vessel is so painted, the vessel may be detained until the defect has been remedied.

58 Vict., c.

(3.) For the purposes of this and the next succeeding section the expression "hospital-ship" means any ship constructed or adapted for the sole purpose of assisting the sick, wounded, or shipwrecked.

(B.)

Hague Conventions Bill.

Notes on Clauses.

SOME of the provisions contained in the various conventions drawn up at The Hague in 1907 cannot be put in force without legislative authority, and other provisions, though perhaps not absolutely necessitating legislation, are of such a nature that it seems desirable that they should receive statutory sanction.

The present Bill has been drawn in consultation with the interdepartmental committee, and is strictly confined to the provisions necessary or desirable to enable the conventions (other than the convention relative to the establishment of an international prize court) to be put in force. It does not contain the amendments of the "Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870," recommended by the interdepartmental committee in cases where the provisions of that Act are more stringent than the international obligations imposed by the conventions.

The object of this clause is to enable the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents to be enforced in connection with proceedings before a commission of enquiry (see article 23 of the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes) and before courts of arbitration (see article 76 of the same convention and article 25 of the convention relative to the creation of a judicial arbitration court). The language of the clause has also been made wide enough to cover proceedings before an international prize court should His Majesty's Government assent to the convention on that subject.

The form of subsections (1) and (2) is suggested by the provisions of the "War Stores Commission Act, 1905" (5 Edw. VII, cap. 7). But it differs from the last-mentioned Act in that that Act gives the War Stores Commission itself powers of punishing for contempt. It seems impossible to give similar powers to the Secretary of State, and, therefore, under this clause recourse has to be had to the court to enforce any order issued by the Secretary of State.

Article 20 of the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes seems to contemplate the commission of enquiry delegating to one or more of its members the duty of taking evidence, and the language of paragraph (i) has been made wide enough to cover such a case.

The powers of the Secretary of State are made exercisable only on the application of the international tribunal. This is in order to comply with article 25 of the last-mentioned convention, which requires that the witnesses should be summoned through the Government of the State in the territory of which they are. If, therefore, the British Government wished to compel the attendance of a witness resident in England the Secretary of State would first have to apply to the international tribunal and then the international tribunal would apply to the Secretary of State to compel his attendance. It is, however, thought desirable to require that all applications should go through the international tribunal, so that the question whether the attendance of the witness is required can be decided by a legal tribunal.

No provision has been inserted making false evidence before the international tribunal perjury.

Subsection (2) gives effect to article 46 of the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes. It is a question whether the privileges should extend only to the members of the tribunals "in the performance of their duties." The words "Ambassadors and Public Ministers of foreign States" are taken from the Act of 7 Anne, cap. 12.

Subsection (5).—This is taken from section 26 of "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870."

This clause proposes to enable His Majesty, by order in council, to regulate various matters, so that the obligations imposed on neutrals may be enforced.

In leaving matters to be regulated by orders in council instead of providing for them expressly in the Bill, the Bill follows numerous precedents of Acts for giving effect to treaties and conventions; for instance, "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1862" (25 & 26 Vict., cap. 63), sections 58–64; "The Sea Fisheries Act, 1868" (31 & 32 Vict., cap. 45); "The International Copyright Act, 1886" (49 & 50 Vict., cap. 33). The method is a convenient one, and enables effect to be given to any modifications made by future treaties without further legislative powers.

Paragraph (a).—This paragraph is intended to enable regulations to be made to cover the obligations imposed by articles 17, 18, 19, and 20 of the convention respecting the rights and duties of neutral Powers in maritime war, which are as follows:—

"Art. 17. In neutral ports and roadsteads belligerent war-ships may only carry out such repairs as are absolutely necessary to render them seaworthy, and may not add in any manner whatever to their fighting force. The local authorities of the neutral Power shall decide what repairs are necessary, and these must be carried out with the least possible delay.

"Art. 18. Belligerent war-ships may not make use of neutral ports, roadsteads, or territorial waters for . . . completing their crews.

"Art. 19. Belligerent war-ships may only revictual in neutral ports or roadsteads to bring up their supplies to the peace standard. Similarly these vessels may only ship sufficient fuel to enable them to reach the nearest port in their own country. They may, on the other hand, fill up their bunkers built to carry fuel when in neutral countries which have adopted this method of determining the amount of fuel to be supplied.

"If, in accordance with the law of the neutral Power, the ships are not supplied with coal within twenty-four hours of their arrival, the duration of their permitted stay is extended by twenty-four hours.

"Art. 20. Belligerent war-ships which have shipped fuel in a port belonging to a neutral Power may not, within the succeeding three months, replenish their supply in a port of the same Power."

At present the only legislation affecting the subject is section 8 (3) of "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870," which prohibits under penalty any person without a licence from His Majesty "equipping" any ship with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe, that the same shall or will be employed in the naval service of a belligerent. A very wide definition is given of equipping, but the supply of fuel is not expressly mentioned in the definition, and none of the language of the provision seems appropriate to deal with the case of a belligerent war-ship calling at a neutral port.

Paragraph (b) is intended to give the necessary powers to carry out the obligation of internment foreign troops and the crews of foreign vessels (see article 11 of the convention respecting the rights and duties of neutral Powers and persons in war on land; article 15 of the convention for the adaptation of the principles of the Geneva Convention to maritime war; articles 3 and 21 of the convention respecting the rights and duties of neutral Powers in maritime war).

Apart, however, from the conventions, a neutral is by international law required to intern belligerent troops who cross the frontier, and to meet this obligation the words "or otherwise" have been inserted. The necessity for legislation on the subject was demonstrated when it was proposed to intern the Russian sailors rescued by His Majesty's ship "Talbot" at Chemulpo. It was at one time intended to intern them in Ceylon, and the Colonial Secretary was advised that, in order to prevent the Russians leaving the colony, special local legislation would probably be necessary, providing for their arrest and imprisonment if they attempted to do so, and that even if it were intended only to curtail their liberty to move about the island, legislation would also be required.

Paragraph (c) is intended to cover the provisions of article 3 of the convention respecting the rights and duties of neutral Powers and persons in war on land, and article 5 of the convention respecting the rights and duties of neutral Powers in maritime war, and closely follows the language of the first-mentioned article. As no obligation of censoring telegrams is imposed (see article 8 of the convention respecting the rights and duties of neutral Powers and persons in war on land), it is not proposed to confer any such power on the executive.

General words are added at the end of subsection (1) which will probably be wide enough to include the conferring on executive authorities of the powers of seizure and search.

Subsection (2), making the contravention of the order in council an offence under the Foreign Enlistment Act, will obviate the necessity of bringing in all such provisions as those contained in sections 16, 17, and 18 of the Act of 1870. It will, however, require the proceedings to be by indictment, and it might be advisable to enable the offence to be prosecuted summarily. If, however, it is decided to make offences under this bill punishable summarily, it would probably be well to extend the provision so as to include the offences under the Foreign Enlistment Act.

Subsection (3) defines the time during which an order in council under this clause is to remain operative. As the contravention of the provisions of the order in council whilst it is in operation will involve penal consequences, it is essential that there should be a definite time when the order comes into operation and when it ceases to be in operation. It is suggested that (unless made during hostilities) it should be brought into operation, and its operation terminated, by proclamations.

Clause 3.

This clause is necessary in order to carry into effect the provisions of articles 6 and 21 of the convention for the adaptation of the principles of the Geneva Convention to maritime war, which prohibit the painting of ships, other than hospital-ships, with the marks characteristic of hospital-ships.

Subsection (1).—It is thought that a penalty of 100*l.*, with a liability to detention, will be sufficient to guard against breaches of this provision. If in time of war unauthorised use is made of the distinctive signs of hospital-ships by ships which are not hospital-ships, the ships which use them will, of course, not have the protection to which they would be entitled as hospital-ships.

The last paragraph of the subsection follows the form of section 7 (5) of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894."

The whole clause is to be read as part of the Merchant Shipping Act (see subsection (3)), and this will import the definition of vessel in section 742 of that Act as including "any ship or boat or any other description of vessel used in navigation," the general provisions of that Act with regard to the recovery of penalties (see sections 680-3, 689), and the procedure where, under that Act, a vessel may be detained (see section 692, which provides inter alia for the detention of the offending vessel by naval and military officers, officers of Customs, &c.).

Subsection (2).—The definition of "hospital-ship" is based on the language in article 1 of the convention. Presumably it is intended that any vessel which is constructed or adapted for use of a hospital-ship may use the characteristic marks, whether a war is or is not actually in progress.

Subsection (4).—As the painting of some existing boats may offend against the provisions of this clause, the date of the coming into operation of the clause is deferred for three months.

Clause 4.

This clause is inserted in view of the provisions of article 12 of the convention for adapting the principles of the Geneva Convention to maritime warfare.

It is perhaps questionable whether any such enactment is required to give effect to the article, but it seems desirable to have an express enactment, as without such an enactment questions as to "insult to the flag" might be raised when a foreign ship demanded and sought to enforce the rights under the convention.

The clause is limited to combatants rescued during or after an engagement in which they have taken part in order that it should not go further than the article, subject to the British reservation.

The clause is drawn so as to apply to hospital-ships, whether England is at war or not, but to other vessels only when England is a neutral.

Clause 5.

The Bill extends only to the "British dominions." This expression would not include British protectorates or Cyprus, but the provisions of the Bill could be extended to them by appropriate orders in council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Acts. It has been thought that this would probably be the most convenient method of extending the Bill to protectorates, as, not only is the expression "British protectorate" hard to define, but also the circumstances of the different protectorates vary, so that the provisions of the Bill would have to be differently adapted to suit those different circumstances.

No. 7.

[December 22, 1909.]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, November 4, 1909.

SIR EDWARD GREY duly received your report of the 5th August favouring him with your observations on the draft Bill which has been prepared to give effect to the legislation desirable in the case of certain of the conventions agreed to at the Second Peace Conference held at The Hague in 1907 before they are ratified by the King.

Sir E. Grey now desires me to submit the following observations for your consideration with reference to paragraphs 3 and 4 of your report.

In the former paragraph (para. 3) the view is expressed that, as the law now stands, the repairing and revictualling of belligerent war-ships is an offence against "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870;" and that, therefore, in order to enable full effect to be given to the "convention concerning the rights and duties of neutral Powers in maritime war"—in so far as repairing and revictualling of ships is allowed within certain limits—an amendment of the Foreign Enlistment Act will be required.

Sir E. Grey is informed that this point was not lost sight of by the inter-departmental committee which, under the chairmanship of the Earl of Desart, was appointed to advise on the acceptance of the conventions drawn up at the Second Peace Conference, and under whose supervision the first draft of the Bill was prepared. That committee had already advised that an amendment of section 8 (4) of the Foreign Enlistment Act was desirable, and this point was referred to you, and is dealt with in your report of the 4th March, 1909. They doubted, however, whether a further amendment on the subject of repairing and revictualling was essential.

The proceedings which are prohibited by sections 8 and 10 of the Act in question are only prohibited when done "without the licence of Her Majesty," and by section 15 a licence may be signified by an order in council, and the committee thought that if repairing or revictualling within the limits prescribed by the convention was authorised by the order in council to be enacted under the proposed Bill, such repairing or revictualling would be done with the licence of the Crown, and would not technically be an offence against section 8 of the Foreign Enlistment Act.

I am accordingly to request that you will be good enough to take this further point into your consideration, and to favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as regards the correctness or otherwise of the view taken by the inter-departmental committee in the matter.

A Bill to amend the Foreign Enlistment Act has already been prepared by the parliamentary counsel, and Sir Edward Grey would prefer to insert in that Bill any amendments of the existing Act which you think are called for in the matter of repairing and revictualling of belligerent war-ships. The prohibition contained in sections 8 and 10 are, in the absence of a licence from the Crown, absolute, but repairing and revictualling have always been allowed in this country within certain limits, and it would seem preferable to avoid legislating upon the footing that such proceedings were absolutely prohibited under the Act, and that the necessity for legalising them flows from the Peace Conference conventions. Doubts have from time to time been expressed in this office as to whether any legislative sanction exists for the regulation of the coaling, revictualling, or repairing of belligerent war-ships in this country, but up till now the right of the customs officers to carry out the "Coaling Rules" has never been questioned. The necessity, however, of amending section 8 (4) of the Foreign Enlistment Act would give an opportunity of introducing any amendments you think desirable with regard to repairing and revictualling.

I am accordingly to ask whether you see any objection to this course.

With regard to paragraph 4 of your report, relating to article 9 (2) of the "convention respecting the rights and duties of neutral Powers and persons in war on land," which provides that a neutral Power shall see that private companies apply impartially to both belligerents restrictions as regards telegraphs, &c., imposed by the convention, I am to state that Sir E. Grey is informed that the inter-departmental committee were of opinion that it was not desirable that the draft Bill should deal with that question.

Up till now His Majesty's Government have had no difficulty in carrying out telegraph censorship rules which they have felt bound to impose, despite the fact that

Conference

tions Bill:

they possess no statutory authority enabling them to enforce such rules. The various cable companies have always acquiesced willingly in such steps as have been deemed necessary from time to time.

The effect of the convention of 1907 is materially to lessen the responsibilities of neutral Powers with regard to censorship; they are relieved of the obligation to impose a censorship, but if, in their own interest, they consider it desirable to take such measures, it is required that the regulations should be applied impartially.

If a Power should impose such restrictions it will be with a view to protect cables or wires from being cut by the belligerent. It is therefore entirely in the interests of the British cable companies to comply with the obligations of neutrality because of the risk of their cables being cut, and it is doubtless for this reason that no difficulty in the matter has arisen in past years.

So far as concerns wireless telegraph companies His Majesty's Government are in a position to enforce compliance with such restrictions, owing to the possibility of withdrawing the licence granted to these companies.

A further argument in favour of omitting the matter from the draft Bill is the difficulty of framing any measure which would be effective. The mere subsequent imposition of penalties might not be adequate, seeing that the object is to prevent improper use by one belligerent, not to punish it subsequently for an improper use previously effected. Moreover, if for this purpose His Majesty's Government attempted to take power to control the entire use of cables in time of war, it seems probable that the cable companies would resent such action, and might indeed cease to co-operate with His Majesty's Government in carrying out the obligations imposed upon this country.

Sir E. Grey would therefore be glad if you would be good enough to take into consideration the views expressed above, and to inform him whether you still consider that it is necessary that the draft Bill should deal with this point, and, if so, to indicate for his guidance the lines upon which you consider that the clause should proceed.

For convenience of reference a printed copy of your report of the 5th August is enclosed herewith, together with the papers which accompanied my letter of the 19th May last, to which it relates.

I have, &c.

Report.

In our opinion a licence from the Crown, given by an order in council made under "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870," to revictual, recoal, and repair belligerent war-ships in accordance with articles 17 and 19 of the convention respecting the rights and duties of neutral Powers in a maritime war would be effective for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of those articles without further amendment of section 8 of the Foreign Enlistment Act. We think that an order in council made under clause 2 (1) (A) of the draft Bill as it now stands would not be appropriate for the purpose of giving the limited privilege of revictualling, recoaling, and repairing allowed by the convention. That clause provides only for the making of regulations of a preventive or restrictive character, and revictualling, recoaling, and repairing, are already wholly prohibited unless licensed under the Act of 1870.

2. With regard to paragraph 4 of our report of the 5th August, 1909, as His Majesty's Government are of opinion that they will be able in practice to perform, without statutory powers, the obligation imposed by the second paragraph of article 9 of the convention respecting the rights and duties of neutral Powers and persons in war on land, we see no objection to omitting the subject from the draft Bill.

[In Board of Trade,
August 30, 1909.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. Rowlatt.

PRIOR to 1907 the practice of the Board of Trade as regards the disposal of the estates of German seamen dying on British ships or territory was based on the arrangement between the British and North German Governments as set out in correspondence of which the following is a copy:—

*Estates of
seamen dying on British ships, and vice versa.*

"M. le Chargé d'Affaires,

"Foreign Office, October 19, 1869.

"With reference to my note of the 16th ultimo, I have now the honour to inform you that the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade have stated to me that it is in their power to deliver to the Consul-General in London of the North German Confederation, without the usual formalities, the money and effects of North German seamen under the value of 50*l.* received by their Lordships under the provisions of 'The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854'; and their Lordships are willing to agree to do so on the understanding that the North German Government will engage to deliver to the respective British Consuls property of British seamen on board North German vessels or on North German territory.

"I beg to assure you that it will give Her Majesty's Government much pleasure to meet the wishes of your Government in this matter, and I request that you will be so good as to ascertain whether this arrangement will be agreeable to them.

"I am, &c.

"(Translation.)

"My Lord,

"Prussia House, November 1, 1869.

"I have had the honour of receiving your Excellency's courteous note of the 16th ultimo relating to the agreement to be come to between the Government of the North German Confederation and the Royal British Government respecting the delivery of the effects left by German sailors deceased in the British service and British sailors deceased in the German service, and I have made the Chancellor of the Confederation acquainted therewith. Whereupon I am now authorised to declare the acceptance of the proposition made in that note by the Lords of Trade in regard to effects under the value of 50*l.*, with an assurance of reciprocity on the part of the North German Confederation. In making that declaration hereby on behalf of the Confederation I beg leave at the same time to state, with reference to the previous negotiations, that by the expression 'the respective British Consuls,' made use of in the note of the 19th October, the Administration of the Confederation concludes that that British Consul is intended in whose district the crew of the German ship to which the deceased British seaman belonged is passed in examination. Should this acceptance not be in accordance with that of Her Britannic Majesty's Government, I beg that your Excellency will be so good as to give me further information on the subject.

"I have, &c.

(Signed) "KATTE.

"The Earl of Clarendon."

"M. le Chargé d'Affaires,

"Foreign Office, November 18, 1869.

"I lost no time in referring to the Lords of Trade the inquiry contained in your note of the 1st instant as to the signification of the words 'the respective English Consuls,' as used by that Board in reference to the proposed arrangements for the reciprocal delivery of the effects of British sailors deceased on board German vessels or of German sailors on board British vessels; and I have now the honour to inform you that the Administration of the North German Confederation is correct in their conclusion as to the interpretation of the words in question.

"I have, &c.
(Signed) "CLARENDON.

"M. de Katte."

Under this arrangement the Board of Trade were to deliver to the Consul-General in London, of the North German Confederation, without the usual formalities, the money and effects of North German seamen under the value of 50*l.* received under the provisions of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854." When the arrangement was entered into 50*l.* was the limit which the Board of Trade could deal with without the production of probate or letters of administration. By section 176 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," the limit was raised to 100*l.*, no doubt in view of the fact that under then existing Inland Revenue Acts no duty is payable on estates under 100*l.* in value.

A copy of a Memorandum upon the subject prepared in the Finance Department of the Board of Trade in 1901 accompanies these papers.

On the 9th September, 1905, the German Chargé d'Affaires wrote to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a letter, of which the following translation was received by the Board of Trade from the Foreign Office, with a covering letter dated the 19th September, 1905, asking what reply should be returned to Count Bernstorff's note:—

"(Translation.)

"My Lord,

"German Embassy, September 9, 1905.

"In the Agreement with the British Government of 1869 respecting the handing over of the estates of deceased seamen are included only such effects as do not exceed the value of 50*l.* This limitation is based on the regulation of section 199 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. This regulation obliged the Board of Trade to make the handing over of the estates of seamen conditional on the production of a proof issued to the recipient in the manner required by English law, but empowered the Board to make an exception in the case of estates of the value of 50*l.* or less, at a rough estimate.

"The maximum value of the estates which the Board of Trade may dispose of without an official proof has meanwhile been increased by the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 (section 176) to 100*l.*

"As experience has shown that it is both difficult and expensive for German heirs living in Germany to prove their right to succeed according to English law, equity requires that these heirs should be freed from the necessity of doing so, at least in those cases in which English law itself allows the exemption.

"From this point of view it appears to the Imperial Government desirable to amend the above-mentioned Agreement in accordance with section 176 of the Merchant Shipping Act in question in such a way that the Board of Trade may hand over to the Imperial Consulate-General here, without special formalities, all estates of German seamen of the value of 100*l.* or less.

"I have the honour, in accordance with my instructions, to propose to your Excellency an extension of the Agreement of 1869 in the above sense, and to add that I am authorized to declare that the Imperial Government would give complete reciprocity in the extended form of the Agreement.

"I have, &c.
(Signed) "J. BERNSTORFF.

"The Marquess of Lansdowne, K.G.,
" &c. &c. &c."

In reference to this, the Board of Trade sent a letter to the Foreign Office, of which the following is a copy:—

"7, Whitehall Gardens, London, S.W.,
October 10, 1905.

"Sir,

"I am instructed by the Board of Trade to acknowledge your letter of the 19th ultimo, transmitting translation of a note from the German Chargé d'Affaires at this Court, proposing that the Arrangement of 1869 respecting the handing over of the estates of deceased seamen should be so extended as to admit of property from 50*l.* to 100*l.* in value being dealt with without the usual legal formalities.

"With reference thereto I am to direct attention to the Board's letters* F. 8441 of the 24th August, 1894, and F. 9051 of the 19th July, 1901, on similar proposals on the part of Russia, and also to a letter F. 7804 of the 18th July, 1896 (consequent on an application from the Government of the Netherlands), in which the difficulties experienced in giving effect to certain existing Agreements were fully set forth, and to state, for Lord Lansdowne's information, that, after careful consideration of the matter, the Board of Trade are of opinion that the extension of the limit to 100*l.* may be agreed to, provided that an Agreement similar to that concluded with the Government of the Netherlands in 1897, and suggested in 1898 in the correspondence with Austro-Hungary, and in 1901 in the correspondence with Russia, is entered into with the German Government in substitution for the existing Arrangement of 1869.

"A draft form of Agreement is inclosed embodying the alterations which the Board of Trade suggest in the event of a new Arrangement with the German Government being made.

"I have, &c.
(Signed) "T. W. P. BLOMEFIELD."

"The Under-Secretary of State,
"Foreign Office."

The following is a copy of the draft Agreement referred to:—

"Draft of suggested New Arrangement with the German Government.

"ARRANGEMENT for dealing with the Estates of German seamen dying on board British merchant-vessels, or on British or foreign territory which may be received by the Board of Trade under the provisions of 'The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.'

"1. The Board of Trade will in future furnish the German Consul-General in London with copies of the accounts rendered to them in respect of the wages and effects of deceased German† seamen, subjects of the German Emperor, together with any particulars which may be in their possession likely to facilitate the identification of the deceased, and of the legal heirs.

"2. Whenever an estate does not exceed 100*l.* in value, and the Board of Trade are satisfied in any particular case that the legal heirs of the deceased seamen are resident in German territory, and that there are no persons elsewhere who have any valid claim to the wages and effects left by him, they will dispense with the customary form of claim, and will hand over the property in question to the German Consul-General in London.

"3. Before actually disposing of the estate of a German seaman in accordance with British law, the Board will give notice to the German Consul-General of their proposal to hand over such property to claimants, and will consider any representations that he may make thereon.

"4. It is understood that the estates of British seamen received by the German Government, whether dying on board German merchant-vessels, or on German or foreign territory, will similarly be handed over to His Majesty's Consular officers."

On the 2nd January, 1907, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs sent to the Board of Trade a copy of a note from the German Ambassador dated the 18th December, 1906, which was as follows:—

"(Translation.)

"[43364]

"Your Excellency,

"German Embassy, London, December 18, 1906.

"Lord Lansdowne was good enough to transmit to me in his note of the 19th October of last year the draft of a new Anglo-German Agreement relative to the surrender of seamen's legacies, in place of the one concluded in 1869.

* These letters are copied separately from and accompany this case.
† Alteration proposed by German Ambassador. F. 245/07.

"The German Government entirely concur in the wording of this draft in itself, but, in view of the practice which has been in existence for years in dealings with the British Board of Trade, of handing over without further formality legacies left by persons deceased whose German birth is absolutely established, though the retention of their German nationality up to the time of their death may not be so established, the German Government think it would be desirable to substitute for the words ' . . . of deceased seamen subjects of the German Emperor ' (under section No. 1 of the draft)—corresponding to the terms 'German seamen' and 'British seamen' used in the heading and in section 4 of the draft—the more general wording ' . . . of deceased German seamen.'

"I have the honour to propose to your Excellency, in accordance with instructions, an alteration in this sense of the form of section 1 of the draft, and I am to add that I have been authorised, in the event of this change of wording meeting with the approval of His Majesty's Government, to conclude the new Agreement in the same manner as the one of 1869 was concluded, that is to say, by means of an exchange of notes between the Foreign Office and myself.

"I have the honour to request your Excellency to be good enough to favour me with a communication as to the attitude of His Majesty's Government towards this proposal, and I have, &c.

The Board sent a reply to the Foreign Office in the following terms:—

January 9, 1907.

"Sir,
"I am directed by the Board of Trade to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 43364/06 of the 2nd instant, transmitting copy of a note from the German Ambassador proposing that in Clause 1 of the new Anglo-German Agreement relative to the surrender of the property of deceased seamen the words 'deceased German seamen' should be substituted for the words 'deceased seamen subjects of the German Emperor,' and to state for Sir Edward Grey's information that they see no objection to the alteration suggested.

On the 26th February, 1907, the Foreign Office sent to the Board of Trade for consideration a translation of a letter received from the German Embassy in the following terms:—

"(Translation.)
"[5649]

"Your Excellency, German Embassy, February 16, 1907.

"In my note of the 9th September, 1905, I proposed a modification, in accordance with paragraph 176 of 'The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894,' in the terms of the Agreement concluded with the British Government in 1869 respecting the handing over of the estates of deceased seamen, and your Excellency's predecessor was good enough to inform me on the 19th October, 1905, that the British Government agreed with the proposal to replace the existing Agreement of 1869 by another one.

"I have the honour, accordingly, with reference to the modification approved in your note of the 23rd ultimo of the draft communicated in the Foreign Office note of the 19th October, 1905, to propose, in the name of the Imperial Government, the following Agreement as to the treatment of the estates of German seamen dying on board British merchant-vessels either in British or foreign territory, which, in accordance with the provisions of 'The Merchant Shipping Act, 1904,' are sent to the British Board of Trade.

"1. The Board of Trade will in future furnish the German Consul-General in London with copies of the accounts rendered to them in respect of the wages and effects of deceased German seamen, together with any particulars which may be in their possession likely to facilitate the identification of the deceased and of the legal heirs.

"2. Whenever an estate does not exceed 100*l.* in value, and the Board of Trade are satisfied in any particular case that the legal heirs of the deceased seamen are resident in German territory, and that there are no persons elsewhere who have any valid claim to the wages and effects left by him, they will dispense with the customary form of claim and will hand over the property in question to the German Consul-General in London.

"3. Before actually disposing of the estate of a German seaman in accordance with British law, the Board will give notice to the German Consul-General of their proposal to hand over such property to claimants, and will consider any representations that he may make thereon.

"4. It is understood that the estates of British seamen received by the German Government, whether dying on board German merchant-vessels or on German or foreign territory, will similarly be handed over to His Majesty's Consular officers.

"I have the honour to request your Excellency to state whether the British Government concur in the above Agreement, and in that case I should consider the matter settled on receiving a declaration to that effect from your Excellency.

The Board of Trade then wrote to the Foreign Office in the following terms:—

"7, Whitehall Gardens, London, S.W.,
March 2, 1907.

"Sir,
"I am directed by the Board of Trade to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 5649 of the 26th ultimo, forwarding translation of a letter from the German Embassy as to the terms of the proposed new Anglo-German Agreement relative to the surrender of the property of deceased seamen, and to state, for the information of the Secretary of State, that they concur in the Agreement as now submitted.

On the 28th March, 1907, the Foreign Office wrote to the Board of Trade enclosing a copy of a letter addressed to the German Ambassador, thus:—

"Sir, Foreign Office, March 28, 1907.

"With reference to your letter F. 4422 of the 2nd instant, I am directed by Secretary Sir E. Grey to transmit to you herewith copy of a note which he has addressed to the German Ambassador at this Court, accepting on behalf of His Majesty's Government the arrangements proposed in his Excellency's note of the 16th ultimo, copy of which was inclosed in my letter of the 26th ultimo, regarding the estates of deceased seamen.

"I am to inquire whether the Board consider that the notes should be published in the Treaty Series of Parliamentary publications issued by this Department.

"Your Excellency,

"Foreign Office, March 21, 1907.

"I have the honour to inform you that I accept in the name of His Majesty's Government the following arrangements, as proposed in your Excellency's note of the 16th ultimo, regarding the handing over of the estates of German seamen dying on board British merchant-vessels either in British or foreign territory, which estates are in the first instance sent to the British Board of Trade in accordance with the provisions of 'The Merchant Shipping Act, 1904':—

"1. The British Board of Trade will in future furnish the Imperial German Consul-General in London with copies of the accounts rendered to them in respect of the wages and effects of deceased German seamen, together with any particulars which may be at their disposal likely to facilitate the identification of the deceased and of the legal heirs.

"2. In every case when an estate does not exceed 100*l.* in value, and the British Board of Trade are satisfied that the legal heirs of the deceased seaman are resident in German territory, and that there are no persons elsewhere who have any valid claim to the wages and effects left by him, they will dispense with the customary form of claim, and will hand over the property in question to the Imperial German Consul-General in London.

"3. Before actually disposing of the estate of a German seaman in accordance with British law, the British Board of Trade will give notice to the Imperial German Consul-General of their intention to hand over such property to those persons having claims upon it, and will consider any representations that the Imperial German Consul-General may make thereon.

"4. It is understood that the estates of British seamen received by the Imperial German Government, whether dying on board German merchant-vessels either on German or foreign territory, will similarly be handed over to His Britannic Majesty's Consular officers.

The Board of Trade replied thus:—

"7, Whitehall Gardens, London, S.W.,
April 17, 1907.

"Sir,
"I am directed by the Board of Trade to acknowledge receipt of your letter 7188/07 of the 28th ultimo, and of revised version of a note which has been addressed to the German Ambassador at this Court accepting, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, the arrangements proposed regarding the estates of deceased seamen, and to state that the Board have no objection to the inclusion of the notes in the Treaty Series of Parliamentary publications issued by your Department.

"The Under-Secretary of State."

On the 22nd July, 1908, the Foreign Office sent to the Board of Trade a translation of a note received from the German Ambassador, which was as follows:—

"(Translation.)

"(J. No. 2252.)

"Your Excellency,

German Embassy, June 30, 1908.

"Since the extension of the Agreement of 1869 respecting the estates of deceased persons by the exchange of notes of the 16th February and 21st March, 1907, the Board of Trade have modified the practice which had hitherto been observed in connection with the handing over of the estates of deceased seamen in the following respect: Instead of handing over all such estates forthwith to the German Consul-General in London, they now merely intimate to the Consul-General that the demise has occurred, transmitting at the same time such documents and other effects as may lead to the discovery of the heirs. If such heirs are discovered, and proof of their existence given to the Board, the deceased's estate is then handed over, otherwise the Board decline to hand over the estate.

"Thus, for instance, in cases where nothing further is known about the personal affairs of the deceased than that he stated, when signing on to a British ship, that he was a German or that he came from Germany, his estate would in future not be handed over to the German Consul-General, as the existence of heirs in Germany could not be proved to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade. Even the discovery of heirs by means of advertisement or by the publication of the demise, for the costs of which the effects of the deceased act as surety, is thereby rendered more difficult, and in most cases made absolutely impossible, since, in the event of failure, there would be no means of covering the expenditure which had been incurred.

"The new procedure adopted by the Board of Trade does not appear to the German Government to be free from objection. It rests on No. 2 of the Agreement, which as it now stands, runs as follows:—

"In every case in which an estate does not exceed 100*l.* in value, and the British Board of Trade are satisfied that the legal heirs of the deceased seaman are resident in German territory . . . , they will dispense with the customary form of claim and will hand over the property in question to the Imperial German Consul-General in London."

"As, however, is shown by the negotiations which led to the conclusion of the new Agreement, the sole object aimed at was to increase the number of estates which might be handed over without any special formalities and to apply to estates of from 50*l.* to 100*l.* the benefits formerly attaching only to estates of 50*l.* and under. For this purpose the necessary basis was afforded by the modifications introduced into British legislation since 1869 (see the note from this Embassy of the 9th September, 1905).

"Any measure which tends to render more difficult the procedure for handing over the effects of deceased seamen, as must be the effect of the present action of the Board of Trade, is, in the view of the German Government, in contradiction to the object aimed at by the new Agreement. The Board of Trade can, it is true, point to the wording of No. 2. This wording was, however, put forward by the British Government without any comment and straightway accepted by the German Government, since the latter had from the first assumed that those implications ('Voraussetzungen') and conditions would alone be preserved which for a period of forty years had governed the practice of handing over without any formalities the estates of deceased seamen.

"The German Government appeared to be all the more justified in adopting this view, seeing that in section 176 of 'The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894,' on which the authority of the Board of Trade for handing over such estates without formality rests, there is no limitation of the right to the legal heirs; on the contrary the Board of Trade free themselves from the obligation incurred by assuming the inheritance if they hand over the estate to the legally constituted personal representative of the deceased. That in the absence of any special plenipotentiary the German Consul-General in London would be recognized by the British Government as such a Representative, did not appear to the German Government to be open to any doubt. Moreover, by German law the Exchequer becomes the 'legal heir' in the absence of a relative (S.1936 B.G.B.). From the German point of view, therefore, the wording of the Board of Trade draft which makes the handing over of an estate dependent on proof of the existence of legal heirs in Germany, undoubtedly implied that only the former practice would be sanctioned, under which the Board of Trade handed over the estate as soon as they were satisfied that the deceased seaman was a German.

"If, however, a seaman had stated when signing on to a British ship that he was of German nationality or came from Germany he should, in the opinion of the German Government, be considered a German until the contrary had been proved.

"The German Government hold, therefore, that the Board of Trade can assume without further inquiry that a seaman who has stated that he is a German has 'legal heirs' in Germany.

"This view is further in accordance with the principle recognized by international law that, in the absence of nearer claimants, the community to which the deceased person belonged is to be recognized as heir to the estate of such deceased person.

"On the German side a similar procedure was adopted with regard to the estates of British seamen which came into the hands of the German authorities. Thus quite recently, at the instigation of the German Government, the full estate of the British seaman George Johnson was handed over to the British Vice-Consul at Bremen, although nothing was known in Germany concerning the heirs, the information at the disposal of the German Government merely going to show that the deceased was of British nationality.

"In compliance with my instructions I have the honour to request that your Excellency will be so good as to approach the Board of Trade in the matter with a view to the retention in future of the practice which was formerly observed regarding the handing over of the estates of deceased seamen of German nationality.

"Awaiting your Excellency's reply, I have, &c.

(Signed) "P. METTERNICH."

In reference to this the Board of Trade sent to the Foreign Office a letter in the following terms:—

"7, Whitehall Gardens, London, S.W.,
October 13, 1908.

"Sir,

"I am directed by the Board of Trade to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 22nd July last forwarding, for their observations, copy of a note from the German Ambassador on the subject of the disposal, under the Arrangement of February-March 1907, of the estates of deceased German seamen.

"In reply, I am to remind the Secretary of State that when the German Chargé d'Affaires suggested in September 1905 that the Arrangement of 1869 should be so extended as to admit of estates from 50*l.* to 100*l.* in value being dealt with without the necessity of taking out representation the Board expressed their opinion (F. 18424 of the 10th October, 1905) that the extension might be agreed to provided that an Agreement on the model of that concluded with the Netherlands in 1897 were substituted for the existing one. At the same time they forwarded a draft indicating in exact terms the conditions to which they were prepared to agree, and which, in due course, after some slight verbal alterations, was accepted by the German Government.

"The difficulties experienced in giving effect to the earlier Arrangements with Germany and other countries, from the circumstance that in practice they were found to operate against the interests of relatives residing in the United Kingdom, and to conflict occasionally with British law, were fully set forth in the Board's letter to the Foreign Office (F. 7804 of the 18th July, 1896) with the result that when the Arrangement of 1897 with the Netherlands was entered into different conditions were introduced.

"Under the Arrangement of 1907 the wages and effects of deceased German seamen are handed over to the German Consul-General in London, when it appears that there are legal heirs resident in German territory. If the legal heirs reside elsewhere the Board of Trade deal with them direct, and when no legal heirs can be traced the property is retained and eventually appropriated in aid of the Board of Trade vote for Mercantile Marine services.

"The practical effect of this arrangement is that it enables the Board of Trade to recognise the German Consul-General in London as the official representative of relatives of deceased German seamen who are known to reside in Germany, and to make payment to him on their behalf. This is a convenient method of administration and avoids unnecessary formality and trouble.

"The real objection of the German Government to the working of the recent arrangement relates apparently to the mode in which it affects the disposal of the estates of deceased German seamen for whom no heirs are forthcoming, and it is contended by the German Ambassador that inasmuch as by German law the German Exchequer becomes the legal heir in the absence of a relative the Board of Trade can reasonably assume, without further inquiry, that a deceased seaman, who has stated that he is a German, has legal heirs in Germany.

"With reference thereto I am to state that under section 176, Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, the Board of Trade are duly empowered to hand over the estate of a deceased seaman (under 100*l.* in value) to the widow, or child, or person entitled to take out representation, and that it does not appear that the German Consul-General, except as the attorney of the heir, or next of kin, of the deceased, would be entitled to take out representation in the British Courts.

"It is further enacted by section 179 of the same Act that when no claim is substantiated the property is to fall to the Mercantile Marine Fund. The Board would, however, not plead that fact as a bar against any claim, whenever made and substantiated.

"In these circumstances, it will be seen that the Board of Trade has no power to pay over to the German authorities the property of any German seaman dying on board British merchant-ships, &c., for whom no legal heir is forthcoming, and I am to suggest for Sir Edward Grey's consideration that the German Ambassador should be informed accordingly.

"I have, &c.
(Signed) "H. LLEWELLYN SMITH.

"The Under-Secretary of State,
"Foreign Office."

On the 16th March, 1909, the Foreign Office wrote to the Board of Trade thus:—

"Sir,

"Foreign Office, March 16, 1909.

"I am directed by Secretary Sir E. Grey to state that he has had under his careful consideration your letter 17853 of the 13th October last, in which you suggested that the German Ambassador should be informed that the Board of Trade had no power to pay over to the German authorities the property of any German seamen dying on board British merchant-ships, &c., for whom no legal heirs were forthcoming. I am to offer the following observations on this subject, for the consideration of the Board of Trade.

"The contention of the German Government is, as the Board of Trade are aware, that the German Exchequer is, by German law, in the absence of other heirs, the legal heir to the estates of persons of German nationality dying intestate in any place whatever. The Board have, however, been advised that this claim would not be admitted by the Courts of this country as entitling the German Consul-General to take out representation, on behalf of his Government, under section 176 of 'The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.'

"Sir E. Grey understands that this opinion is chiefly based on the decision in the case 'In re Barnett's Trusts,' of which the following is the head-note given on p. 847, vol. 1, Law Reports, Chancery Division, 1902":—

"'An Austrian who was entitled to a fund in Court in this country died in Vienna, a bastard, intestate, and without heirs. By Austrian law the succession of an Austrian citizen in such a case is confiscated as heirless property by the Fiskus. The Austrian Government having claimed the fund:

"'Held, that as the right claimed was not in the nature of a succession, the maxim Mobilia sequuntur personam did not apply, and that the Crown, by the law of England, was entitled to the fund as bona vacantia.'

"I am to observe that this was a case in which the person involved died without heirs according to Austrian law, and therefore differs in the most essential point from that of a German subject, possessed of personal property, dying intestate and without any next of kin surviving him, if according to German law the German State are in the absence of other heirs to be regarded as the legal heirs of such German subject.

"In view of this fact, and in order that the German Government may be assured that the fullest consideration has been given to the question, to which they appear to attach great importance, I am to suggest that the Board should lay a case before the Law Officers of the Crown enquiring whether, in their opinion, the effects of German subjects so dying are to be considered as reverting to the British Crown as bona vacantia to which there are no heirs, or whether they should be considered as the property of the German Imperial Treasury, or, as the case may be, of the Federal State or States of the German Empire designated as heir by German law.

"As Sir E. Grey learnt, through private enquiry, that the Board would have no objection to taking this course, he thought it desirable, in order that the Law Officers might be enabled the more thoroughly to consider the point, to obtain the opinion of a German legal expert on the effect of German law in the matter, and he accordingly, on the 10th December last, addressed to His Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin, a despatch containing the necessary instructions. I am to transmit herewith a copy of that despatch, and of the English text of an opinion furnished in compliance therewith by the legal adviser to His Majesty's Embassy at Berlin. The latter document is forwarded in the form in which it was signed by Dr. Schneider, but alterations are shown in the margin in cases in which a comparison with the German text shows them to be required.

"It will be observed that the particular portion of the opinion which is of special value for the consideration of the present question is the first paragraph of Part II in which Dr. Schneider states that, subject to certain modifications without importance from the point of view of the question put to him 'the Treasury takes as legal heir, the general legal status of an heir, according to the circumstances of the case.' The disquisition on the 'Principles respecting Domicil and Nationality' was not invited by this department, and in the event of the whole opinion being communicated to the Law Officers, it might be well to mention this fact in order to avoid giving the impression that the divergence between the British and German views on these matters was considered either by the Foreign Office or the Board of Trade as affecting in any way the point on which the opinion was desired.

"I am to express the hope that, as the German Government are pressing for an early answer to Count Metternich's note of the 30th June last, the matter may be dealt with as expeditiously as possible.

"I am, &c.
(Signed) "W. LANGLEY.

"The Secretary to the Board of Trade."

The despatch from the Foreign Office to His Majesty's Ambassador in Berlin was in the following terms:—

"(35585/08.)

"Foreign Office, December 10, 1908.

"Sir,
"In the course of recent correspondence respecting the procedure adopted by the Board of Trade with regard to the disposal of the effects of German seamen dying intestate, the German Ambassador stated to me that, by German law as laid down in section 1936 of the 'Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch,' the German Exchequer is the 'legal heir' to the estates of deceased persons of German nationality when there is no spouse or relative surviving ('Nach deutschen Recht bei Nichtvorhandensein eines Verwandten oder eines Ehegatten ist der Fiskus gesetzlicher Erbe').

"I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of Count Metternich's statement, but as the point is of considerable importance in its bearing upon the general question at issue, I desire to obtain expert advice as to the interpretation of German law in the matter.

"I have accordingly to request that your Excellency will submit to the Legal Adviser to His Majesty's Embassy the following question:—

"In the event of a person of German domicile, possessed of personal property, dying in Germany intestate and without any next-of-kin him surviving, does the German State (1) become entitled to such personalty in the capacity of 'legal heir' (or, as in the case of personal property it would in this country be called 'legal personal representative') of the deceased person, or (2) does the State assume possession of such property as bona vacantia to which there is no heir?

"Your Excellency should explain that personalty passing to the British Exchequer in similar circumstances is regarded by English law as doing so in the manner indicated by the second of the above alternatives.

"I am, &c.
"(For the Secretary of State)
(Signed) "W. LANGLEY.

"His Excellency the Right Honourable "Sir W. E. Goschen, G.C.V.O., K.C.M.G.,
"&c. &c. &c."

The opinion of Dr. Schneider, referred to in the letter from the Foreign Office of the 16th March, has been copied separately and accompanies this case.

The opinion of Dr. Schneider does not seem to be conclusive or convincing that the property of a German seaman dying on board a British ship or in British territory ought to be handed over to the German authorities. Even assuming that the Civil Code of the 18th August, 1896, section 1936 puts the Treasury authority in the position of taking the property by true right of succession, does that conclude the question? This brings up at once the difference between the English system in regard to succession to moveables on death and the continental system. Here the personal property of a deceased person can only be possessed under an appropriate grant from the proper authority, and only the beneficial interest in the surplus of such property is transmitted on death, whether in the case of testacy or intestacy. The property itself passes by the public grant made after death and implying no beneficial interest.

In the continental system "the moveable property is itself transmitted on death, whether in the case of testacy or intestacy, and such transmission implies a beneficial interest which is limited only by the debts and legacies to be satisfied out of it" (Westlake's "Private International Law," 4th edition, p. 102). It is submitted that the Treasury authority could not come to this country, and, without obtaining letters of administration, sue in his own name to recover any property of the deceased. If that be so, then comes the question, could the Fiskus come here and claim successfully a grant of administration to the estate of a German seaman who had died here without a relation or surviving spouse? Apparently the Fiskus could only apply for such a grant under section 73 of 20 & 21 Vict., cap. 77. Would the Court grant letters of administration to the Fiskus in such circumstances? The section would hardly appear to have contemplated such a case. Moreover, it would seem obvious from the opinion of Dr. Schneider that it would frequently be difficult to determine who would be the right person to put forward to apply for the grant. It is not the Imperial Treasury in all circumstances. Apparently a deceased seaman may have belonged to several different Federal States, in which case the Treasury authority of each of those Federal States is entitled to an equal share in his property. Then again Dr. Schneider says: "According to the Introductory Law of the Civil Code (Article 138) this fundamental prescription leaves the prescription of the various Federal States unchanged, according to which the place of the Treasury may be taken by a Corporation or Foundation or institution, which is then considered as lawful heir." How is the Probate Division of the High Court here to deal with such a state of things?

Then again Dr. Schneider shows the difficulty in the way of reciprocity by his reference to the principle of domicile in English law and he brings himself to a "legal gap, for as an English subject does not belong to any Federal State, there is as a matter of fact no Treasury authority which can come forward as legal heir." There has, Dr. Schneider says, been no decision in regard to this legal anomaly. It may be observed in passing that according to a previous part of the opinion the German law contemplates the possibility of a German not belonging to any Federal State.

Dr. Schneider works it out that in the circumstances with which he is dealing under the No. 3, "the English Treasury would in this case not inherit as 'privileged occupier' of the inheritance as is usual, but as legal heir." But it is submitted that this is not possible according to English law.

A further difficulty in the way of giving effect to the German proposition now under consideration is to be found in that part of Dr. Schneider's opinion under the No. 4: "Establishment of the statutory right of the Treasury." It is here stated that the Treasury can only make good its right as heir when the competent Court has decided that no other heir is in existence. If the heir is not ascertained within a reasonable time the Court has to declare that the Treasury is the only heir existing. This seems to show that the so-called succession under the statute is not complete without judicial aid, and that the Treasury or the Fiskus has no right to claim property here of a deceased German or to attempt to assert any right to be recognized as the person entitled to a grant of letters of administration and become the legal personal representative of the deceased in this country at any rate until a competent Court has declared that the Treasury is the only heir existing.

It will be seen from the letter from the German Ambassador of the 30th June, 1908, that the German Government's proposition is that the Board of Trade should assume without further inquiry that a seaman who has stated that he is a German has legal heirs in Germany.

The Board of Trade are in a difficult position in dealing with this subject, and for the purposes of administration they must no doubt frequently take it for granted that a seaman is a German subject if on joining a ship he gives a German birth-place, and the question arises, what would be the position of the Board of Trade, if they handed property of a seaman of German birth-place to the German Government, and it was subsequently disclosed that the man had become naturalized, say, as an American citizen.

The possibilities in this respect are to some extent illustrated by the following case, which has not yet been disposed of. The Board received a letter of which the following is a copy:—

"360, Bullitt Building, 139, South Fourth Street, Philadelphia, November 2, 1907.

"Dear Sir,

"On the 27th August, 1900, there died in the United States Marine Hospital Ward of St. Agnes Hospital, in this city, a certain Johann Joachim Heinrich Bruhn, late a fireman on the United States light-vessel No. 69, a naturalized citizen of the United States, born at Pohnstorf, Germany, on the 24th December, 1852. The decedent died intestate, unmarried, and without issue, father or mother, or brother or sister surviving, and stated shortly before his death that his nearest relative was

Mr. Fritz Bruhn, an only nephew, residing at Pohnstorf, Germany. The said Fritz Bruhn has since established to the satisfaction of the authorities of the United States Marine Hospital Service, that he is the sole heir of the decedent, and accordingly the effects of the latter have been surrendered to the Imperial German Consul at Philadelphia, for whom I act as attorney.

"Among the effects of the decedent so surrendered we find Pass-book No. 39,534 of the Seamen's Savings Bank under the management of the Board of Trade in the name of Bruhn, the last entry in which is a deposit on the 10th May, 1901, at Cardiff, of 8*l.*, making a total at that date of 40*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.*, with interest still to be credited for the 20th November, 1900, and the similar date in subsequent years. The decedent had property here which will require the raising of administration in this country as his domicile. But I take notice that under your regulations, where a seaman having a deposit with you dies without a will, that 'any deposit or interest that may have belonged to him will be paid over to his nearest relative or legal representative without taking out letters of administration or confirmation, if the deposits are under 50*l.*' As it appears that the deposits in this case will be under this limit, I beg to be advised whether in this case upon the production to you of satisfactory proof of the death of the depositor and that the nephew, Fritz Bruhn, is the nearest relative of the decedent, he can obtain the money on this deposit without raising administration in Great Britain, or remitting the money here to Philadelphia to the administrator to be here appointed. I will be thankful for your further advices whether the German Consulate here had best transmit the pass-book to Fritz Bruhn in Germany, or to the Imperial German Consulate in London.

"Very respectfully yours,

"To the German Consul-General,
"49, Finsbury Square, E.C."

So the matter stands for the moment, but it will be seen that the German Consul-General treats the case as falling under the arrangement between this country and Germany, but it is submitted that this is not so on the ground that from the point of view of the law of this country and of the United States Bruhn was not a German but an American seaman when he died, and consequently is not a person referred to in or contemplated by the arrangement under consideration. In all the circumstances of the case there may ultimately be no objection to the Board of Trade handing over the money in their hands to the German Consul-General, but if such payment is made, then, in order to avoid any future misunderstanding, it is submitted that the Board should point out that the money is not paid to him under the arrangement, but as the agent for the person entrusted, or entitled to be entrusted, with the administration by the Court of the domicile, i.e., the United States, and who as such would be recognised by the Probate Court in this country as being the person entitled to take out letters of administration here.

If Bruhn had left no next-of-kin, it is submitted that it is clear that the German Exchequer could have had no claim to the money in the hands of the Board of Trade belonging to Bruhn. The question would then be whether the United States' Government or Exchequer would have any claim either as against section 179 of the Merchant Shipping Act or as against the Crown's claim to bona vacantia. Incidentally this brings up the question whether the Treasury Solicitor by taking out letters of administration in any case in which property would otherwise fall to be dealt with under section 179 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," could insist upon having the money paid to him. The point is probably not of much practical importance because either way the money ultimately reaches the Exchequer.

It is submitted that in dealing with estates of not exceeding 100*l.* under the provisions of section 176 (1) (b) of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," the Board of Trade, in such circumstances as those which form the subject matter for counsel's opinion, there being ex hypothesi, so far as the Board are aware, no widow, no child, and no will, have no alternative but to refuse to pay, except to a person entitled to take out letters of administration, although no such representation has been taken out.

Section 178 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," enables the Board to deal with claims by creditors where a claim to the property, under section 176 (1) (b), has not previously been allowed, and section 179 enacts that where no claim to the property of a deceased seaman received by the Board is substantiated within six years after the receipt thereof the Board may in their absolute discretion, if any subsequent claim is made, either allow or refuse the claim, and, subject to the allowance of any such claim, shall apply such property in manner provided by Part 12 of the Act (relating to the Mercantile Marine Fund, section 676 (c)). By "The Merchant Shipping (Mercantile Marine Fund) Act, 1898," section 1 (a), the money now finds its way into the Exchequer.

To test the position of the Board of Trade, therefore, it seems necessary first to obtain an authoritative decision or opinion upon the following proposition:—

A seaman of German nationality, and who, so far as is known, has not acquired any other domicile, dies whilst serving on board a British ship, unmarried, intestate, without next-of-kin or relations here or in Germany, leaving upwards of 100*l.*, e.g., in the Seamen's Savings Bank, which, by section 150 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," is to be paid and applied as if the money had been received by the Board of Trade under the Act. In these circumstances the Board of Trade could only pay over the amount to the legal personal representative of the deceased properly constituted, and if no legal personal representative is forthcoming the money will ultimately find its way to the Exchequer in the manner already indicated. Then comes the question, To whom would the Probate Division of the High Court of Justice grant letters of administration? It is presumed that a grant would be made to the Treasury Solicitor in the ordinary course in the absence of any other claimant; but supposing the Fiskus representing the Imperial German Exchequer or some Federal State applied to the Court for letters of administration, would the Court make the grant? Unless the answer to this question is in the affirmative it is submitted that the Board of Trade would not be justified in acceding to the proposition put forward by the German Government, but are giving proper effect by their present practice to the existing arrangement with Germany. If the legal position is one of very great doubt it may be right that the Board should refuse to recognize the German view of it; but then the Foreign Office might at the same time be desirous of offering facilities for raising the question for decision in the Courts, and for this purpose it would probably be immaterial whether the value of the property of any particular German seaman was under or over 100*l.* The question is one of some importance, as whatever decision is arrived at in dealing with Germany must also be applied to other countries with whom the arrangements with regard to the property of deceased seamen are similar to those with Germany and their laws in this respect are similar to those of Germany.

It is rather difficult to understand how the claim of the Austrian Government was dealt with in the Chancery Division, as it was in re Barnett's Trusts. The Treasury Solicitor had obtained letters of administration to Louis Heller, and so long as that grant remained uncanceled it does not appear how the claim of the Austrian Government could have prevailed. Indeed, one would have thought that, strictly speaking, he had no locus standi.

Supposing the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich had been in favour of the claim by the Austrian Government, in what way would effect have been given to it? Surely it would have been necessary that the grant of letters of administration to the Solicitor to the Treasury should be revoked and letters of administration granted to the Austrian Finance Minister.

Counsel are requested to advise the Board of Trade—

1. Whether the personal property in this country of a German subject, not domiciled here, dying intestate, and without leaving a widow or any next-of-kin surviving him, goes to the British Crown as bona vacantia, or whether such property should be considered to be property by right of succession of the German Imperial Treasury, or, as the case may be, of the Federal State or States of the German Empire designated as heir by German law, but subject to letters of administration being taken out in any of the cases?

2. Whether, in consequence, the Board of Trade, under section 176 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," ought to hand over personal property under 100*l.* of a deceased German seaman, within the meaning of the Agreement, to the German Consul as representing the German Imperial Treasury, or, as the case may be, a Federal State of the German Empire as being persons otherwise entitled to the personal property of the deceased within the meaning of section 176?

Incidentally, and in so far as it is necessary to consider the point in connection with No. 1—

3. Whether the personal property in Germany of an Englishman, not domiciled there, dying intestate, and without leaving a widow or any next-of-kin surviving him, can be claimed and received by or on behalf of the British Crown or His Majesty's Treasury as legal heir, or otherwise, and, if so, by what procedure?

4. Generally, if necessary, as to the attitude which the Board of Trade should take in the matter.

Opinion.

1. We are of opinion that if the view of Dr. Schneider is accurate, and the German Crown is legally a successor, the property would go to the Imperial or State Treasury. We cannot help thinking, however, that in all probability it would be found that the German legal theory does not differ in substance for this purpose from the Austrian, which was before Mr. Justice Kekewich in the case referred to. Letters of Administration would (as a general rule and apart from provisions like those in section 176 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894,") have to be taken out by some one, and if the German Government is entitled, letters of Administration would have to be granted to someone on their behalf.

2. In our opinion section 176 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," has no bearing upon the question whether personal property under 100*l.* of a deceased German seaman ought to be handed to the German Consul, unless the Board of Trade are satisfied that there is no widow or next of kin.

The section only authorizes payment to a claimant who is "proved to the satisfaction of the Board to be entitled under a statute of distribution or otherwise," and it is a necessary step in satisfying themselves that the German Government are entitled, to satisfy themselves to some extent, that there are no next-of-kin.

If they are satisfied of this, it seems to us that on Dr. Schneider's opinion they might further be satisfied that the German Treasury was entitled.

3. As soon as the property is brought to this country it must necessarily belong to His Majesty, because it can belong to no one else. We know of no reason why a Representative of His Majesty should not receive the property in Germany and bring it to this country, if the German Government hand it over. But so far as English legal theory is concerned there is no basis on which a title to bona vacantia abroad can be acquired by the British Crown. How German law regards the matter we cannot tell.

4. If compliance by the Board of Trade with any diplomatic arrangement made by His Majesty's Government involves transactions which are not protected by section 176 the result is, after all, only a small pecuniary risk, viz., that of having to account for the money again to any persons entitled thereto.

*Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.*Claim of the Salvador Railway Company.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, May 19, 1909.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you herewith the papers noted in the accompanying list respecting the claim of the Salvador Railway Company arising out of a raid by armed forces of the Nicaraguan Government into the Republic of Salvador, resulting in considerable damage to the company's property in the latter Republic and the death of one of its servants.

2. The circumstances of the case are shortly as follows:—

3. A treaty of peace between Salvador and Nicaragua was signed at Amapala on the 23rd April, 1907. It was ratified by the Legislative Assembly of Salvador on the 8th May, and by that of Nicaragua on the 15th May of the same year. As far as can be ascertained by His Majesty's Minister in Central America, the ratifications have never been exchanged (Paper A). Very shortly after the date of the Nicaraguan ratification an expeditionary force was recruited in Nicaragua by Dr. Prudencio Alfaro, a Salvadorean political refugee. This force included several citizens of Nicaragua, some of whom were in the military service of the Nicaraguan Government (Paper B). On the 11th June, 1907, the force arrived at the port of Acajutla, in Salvador, on board the Nicaraguan war-ship "Momotombo," which was at the time flying the flag of the Nicaraguan State. A steam-tug and some lighters belonging to the railway company were seized. The force then landed and took possession of two of the company's trains, in which they proceeded with their war material along the company's line to the town of Sonsonate. An attack was made upon Sonsonate, during which much damage was done to the company's property and one of their servants was killed.

4. After the attack, which lasted some hours, the troops returned to Acajutla in the company's trains and withdrew in the "Momotombo," taking with them one of the lighters. This lighter was afterwards returned to the company by a firm of shipping agents at Corinto, Nicaragua, "in the name of the Government."

5. On presenting a claim for compensation to the Nicaraguan Government, the company were informed by the Nicaraguan Minister for Foreign Affairs that "the act to which your refer was executed by a revolution headed by Salvadorean chiefs, and was supported by the Government of Nicaragua by reason of the state of war which subsisted at that time between this Republic and that of Salvador, and that it was carried out by virtue of the necessities of a military operation" (Paper C). In a subsequent message to Congress the Nicaraguan President stated that his Government had had reason to fear an attack from Salvador, which had not carried out the provisions of the Treaty of Amapala. They had therefore decided to support a revolution headed by Dr. Prudencio Alfaro (Paper A). In informing His Majesty's Government of the circumstances of the raid, the Salvadorean Minister for Foreign Affairs stated that, relying on the Treaty of Amapala, his Government had disbanded their army "since, now that our differences with Nicaragua were at an end, there was no reason to expect an attack on the sovereignty of Salvador" (Paper D).

6. It is evident from the statements of the Nicaraguan President and Minister for Foreign Affairs that the Nicaraguan Government are primarily responsible for the damage done to the railway company's property. In the abstract, however, that Government would appear to be liable not to His Majesty's Government, but to the Salvadorean Government, Salvador being the State within whose territories the damage in question accrued. The technically correct course for His Majesty's Government to pursue consequently seems to be to present the claim to the Government of Salvador.

7. Nevertheless, in dealings with the minor Republics of Central and South America departures are sometimes made from the more strict and rigid courses which would guide His Majesty's Government in controversies with the Great Powers of European civilisation. In the present case it is clear that any redress which may be obtained will, in fact, come, mediately or immediately, from the Nicaraguan Government.

8. Although, therefore, the view expressed in paragraph 6 of this letter would appear to be theoretically the more correct, it might from the practical standpoint possibly be considered preferable, if no important principle were involved in so doing, to present the claim to the Nicaraguan Government direct in the first instance.

NICARAGUA—SIAM.

9. It is, however, suggested for consideration that the presentation of the claim direct to the Nicaraguan Government would involve, and might be held to operate pro tanto as, a recognition on the part of His Majesty's Government that Nicaragua was, at the time of the incidents out of which the claim arose, at war with Salvador.

10. I am to request that you will take the papers into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to (1) whether His Majesty's Government should officially support the claim of the Salvador Railway Company, and (2), if so, whether the claim should be presented to the Nicaraguan or to the Salvadorean Government.

I am, &c.

LOUIS MALLET.

Report.

1. In our opinion His Majesty's Government should officially support the claim of the Salvador Railway Company.

2. We think that the claim should be presented to the Nicaraguan Government. We have considerable difficulty in suggesting any good grounds upon which a claim against Salvador could be based, as the Government of that country might well reply that they were entirely innocent in the matter, that the injury and damage complained of arose from circumstances over which they had no control, and that it was the Nicaraguan Government that was to blame. The action of that Government cannot, in our opinion, be justified as being an act of war on the part of Nicaragua against Salvador, and, in the circumstances, we do not think that the presentation of the claim direct to Nicaragua would involve any recognition on the part of His Majesty's Government that Nicaragua was at the time in question at war with Salvador. In view, however, of the contention apparently put forward by the Nicaraguan Government, it would, we think, be well in presenting the claim to make it clear that His Majesty's Government cannot recognise that any state of war then existed between Nicaragua and Salvador, or that the acts complained of can be justified as acts of war. We do not know whether the Salvadorean Government would be prepared to join with His Majesty's Government in presenting the claim, but as the acts of the Nicaraguan Government clearly involve a wrong done to Salvador we think that this course should, if possible, be adopted.

SIAM.

No. 9.

[19824]

[June 19, 1909.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, May 25, 1909.

I HAVE the honour to inform you, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, that, under a treaty (paper (A)) signed at Bangkok on the 10th March last between His Majesty the King and His Majesty the King of Siam, the extra-territorial jurisdiction at present exercised by His Majesty in Siam was partially surrendered, and the States of Kelantan, Trengganu, Kedah, Perlis, and the adjacent islands were

Draft Order
in Council:
Cesser of extra-territorial

transferred to the Government of His Majesty. Article 5 of this treaty provided that the jurisdiction of international courts similar to that created at Chiengmai by the treaty of the 3rd September, 1883 (paper (B)), should be extended to all British subjects in Siam registered at the British consulates before the date of the recent treaty, though this system is to come to an end and the jurisdiction of the international courts is to be transferred to the ordinary Siamese courts after the promulgation and the coming into force of the Siamese codes. All other British subjects in Siam are to be subject to the jurisdiction of the ordinary Siamese courts under the conditions defined in the jurisdiction protocol which is annexed to the treaty.

I am accordingly to transmit the draft of an Order in Council (paper (G)) which has been prepared in this Department, providing that, so long as the treaty of the 10th March, 1909, is in force, "The Siam Order in Council, 1906" (paper (E)), shall not apply, except as provided for therein, and also discontinuing its operation in the transferred States, except as to judicial proceedings pending in the courts on the date when the Order in Council, now in draft form, shall come into force.

The only point in connection with the draft Order in Council to which your particular attention need be called arises with regard to the exercise of non-contentious probate jurisdiction by the British consular authorities in dealing with the estates of British subjects registered in Siam at the date of the recent treaty.

Under article 5 of the treaty British subjects so registered pass under the jurisdiction of international courts to the extent that British subjects in the Chiengmai district of Siam have been, since the treaty of the 3rd September, 1883, under the jurisdiction of the international court created by that treaty.

It was admitted by the Siamese Government in 1904, when a discussion arose as to the extent of the probate jurisdiction of the Chiengmai international court, that there was nothing in the treaty of 1883 which deprived His Majesty's consul for the Chiengmai district of the right to issue probates and letters of administration in cases where no dispute arose in the course of the proceedings (see paper (D)). This view was concurred in by Lord Lansdowne, and instructions to that effect were issued to the British representative in Siam. The effect of the first paragraph of article 5 of the new treaty must therefore be that, so long as no dispute arises, His Majesty's consular officers will still be entitled to issue probates of the wills and letters of administration of the estates of British subjects in Siam who were registered in that country on or before the 10th March, 1909.

No such exception, however, appears to apply in the case of other British subjects, and the effect of the last paragraph of article 5 appears to be to transfer to the Siamese all the jurisdiction hitherto exercised by the British courts in respect of persons not registered in Siam as British subjects on or before the 10th March, 1909. The provision in article 7, that in dealing with transferred cases the courts established under the principal Order are to apply Siamese law, has been inserted to prevent the necessity of issuing a King's regulation rendering each Siamese decree as it is enacted binding on British subjects.

I am to request that you will take the draft Order in Council into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

I am also to point out that, in view of the fact that the new treaty must be ratified within four months from the date of signature, Sir E. Grey is anxious to secure the enactment of the Order in Council at as early a date as possible, and he would therefore be greatly obliged if he might receive your report at your earliest convenience.

I have, &c.

Annex.

Draft Siam Order in Council, 1909.

WHEREAS by treaty, grant, usage, sufferance, and other lawful means, His Majesty the King has power and jurisdiction within the dominions of the King of Siam:

And whereas the exercise of the power and jurisdiction aforesaid is now regulated by the Siam Order in Council, 1906:

And whereas by a treaty between His Majesty the King and His Majesty the King of Siam, signed in Bangkok the 10th day of March, 1909, the States of Kelantan, Trengganu, Kedah, Perlis, and the adjacent islands were transferred to the Government of His Majesty, the frontiers of the said territories being defined in the boundary protocol annexed to the said treaty:

And whereas by article 5 of the said treaty it was agreed that the jurisdiction of the Siamese international courts, established by article 8 of the treaty of the 3rd September, 1883, between Her late Majesty Queen Victoria and His Majesty the King of Siam, should, under the conditions defined in the jurisdiction protocol annexed to the said recited treaty of the 10th March, 1909, and printed in the schedule to this Order, be extended to all British subjects in Siam registered at the British consulates before the date of the said treaty, and that this system should come to an end, and the jurisdiction of the international courts should be transferred to the ordinary Siamese courts after the promulgation and the coming into force of the Siamese codes, namely, the Penal Code, the Civil and Commercial Codes, the codes of procedure, and the law for organisation of courts, and that all other British subjects in Siam should be subject to the jurisdiction of the ordinary Siamese courts under the conditions defined in the said jurisdiction protocol:

Now, therefore, His Majesty, by virtue and in exercise of the powers in this behalf by "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," or otherwise in His Majesty vested, is pleased by and with the advice of his Privy Council to order, and it is hereby ordered, as follows:—

1. This Order may be cited as "The Siam Order in Council, 1909," and shall be read as one with "The Siam Order in Council, 1906," hereinafter called the "principal Order."

2. From and after the commencement of this Order the principal Order shall, except as regards any judicial matters pending in any court established by the principal Order on the day above mentioned, ceased to be in force and operation in the States of Kelantan, Trengganu, Kedah, Perlis, and the adjacent islands, being the territories transferred to the control of His Majesty's Government, the frontiers whereof are defined by the boundary protocol annexed to the said treaty.

3. With respect to any civil or criminal case arising within the limits of the principal Order, elsewhere than in the districts referred to in article 2, between British subjects who were registered at the date of the said treaty in accordance with part 8 of the principal Order or in which a British subject so registered may be a party as complainant, accused, plaintiff, or defendant, the principal Order shall not operate or have any effect so long as the said treaty of the 10th March, 1909, continues in force, unless and until such case shall have been transferred by any exercise of the right of evocation in accordance with the provisions of the jurisdiction protocol annexed to the said treaty and printed in the schedule hereto to a court established under the principal Order.

4. Notwithstanding anything contained in article 3, the courts established by the principal Order shall continue to transact all non-contentious business in relation to the probate of wills and the administration of estates of deceased British subjects who were registered in accordance with part 8 of the principal Order at the date of the said treaty; but, except as to non-contentious business, the provisions of article 3 shall apply in matters of probate and administration.

5. "The Foreign Jurisdiction (Probates) Order in Council, 1908," shall not operate in Siam, except to the extent and in the cases where the provisions of the principal Order are in operation.

6. With respect to all civil or criminal cases, other than those referred to in articles 3 and 4, arising within the limits of the principal Order, elsewhere than in the districts referred to in article 2, the principal Order shall not operate or have effect so long as the said treaty continues in force.

7. Where a case is transferred from an international court to a court established by the principal Order, such court shall give such directions as seem proper for its determination, having regard to the proceedings (if any) in the international court. In determining such case the court shall apply any Siamese law, other than a law relating to procedure, which would have been applied in the international court.

In a criminal case, if the accused is handed over by the international court in custody, he may be detained in custody as if he had been arrested under a warrant on the day on which he is handed over.

8. Civil or criminal proceedings which have been instituted in any court established under the principal Order before the commencement of this Order shall not be affected by this Order.

9. Articles 139 to 153 (inclusive), 156, and 157 of the principal Order are hereby repealed, but such repeal shall not affect the past operation of such articles, or any right, title, obligation, or liability accrued, or the validity or invalidity of anything done or suffered under such articles before the commencement of this Order.

SCHEDULE.

Protocol concerning the Jurisdiction applicable in the Kingdom of Siam to British Subjects and annexed to the Treaty dated the 10th March, 1909.

SECTION 1. International Courts shall be established at such places as may seem desirable in the interests of the good administration of Justice; the selection of these places shall form the subject of an understanding between the British Minister at Bangkok and the Siamese Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Sec. 2. The jurisdiction of the International Courts shall extend—

1. In civil matters: To all civil and commercial matters to which British subjects shall be parties.

2. In penal matters: To breaches of law of every kind whether committed by British subjects or to their injury.

Sec. 3. The right of evocation in the International Courts shall be exercised in accordance with the provisions of Article 8 of the Treaty of the 3rd September, 1883.

The right of evocation shall cease to be exercised in all matters coming within the scope of codes or laws regularly promulgated as soon as the text of such codes or laws shall have been communicated to the British Legation in Bangkok. There shall be an understanding between the Ministry for Foreign Affairs and the British Legation at Bangkok for the disposal of cases pending at the time that the said codes and laws are communicated.

Sec. 4. In all cases, whether in the International Courts or in the ordinary Siamese Courts in which a British subject is defendant or accused, a European legal adviser shall sit in the Court of First instance.

In cases in which a British-born or naturalized subject not of Asiatic descent may be a party, a European adviser shall sit as a Judge in the Court of First Instance, and where such British subject is defendant or accused the opinion of the adviser shall prevail.

A British subject who is in the position of defendant or accused in any case arising in the provinces may apply for a change of venue, and should the Court consider such change desirable the trial shall take place either at Bangkok or before the Judge in whose Court the case would be tried at Bangkok. Notice of any such application shall be given to the British Consular officer.

Sec. 5. Article 9 of the Treaty of the 3rd September, 1883, is repealed.

Appeals against the decisions of the International Courts of First Instance shall be adjudged by the Siamese Court of Appeal at Bangkok. Notice of all such appeals shall be communicated to His Britannic Majesty's Consul, who shall have the right to give a written opinion upon the case to be annexed to the record.

The judgment on appeal from either the International Courts or the ordinary Siamese Courts shall bear the signature of two European Judges.

Sec. 6. An appeal on a question of law shall lie from the Court of Appeal at Bangkok to the Supreme or Dika Court.

Sec. 7. No plea of want of jurisdiction based on the rules prescribed by the present Treaty shall be advanced in any Court after a defence on the main issue has been offered.

Sec. 8. In order to prevent difficulties which may arise in future from the transfer of jurisdiction contemplated by the present Treaty and Protocol, it is agreed—

(a.) All cases in which action shall be taken subsequently to the date of the ratification of this Treaty shall be entered and decided in the competent International or Siamese Court, whether the cause of action arose before or after the date of ratification.

(b.) All cases pending in His Britannic Majesty's Courts in Siam on the date of the ratification of this Treaty shall take their usual course in such Courts and in any Appeal Court until such cases have been finally disposed of, and the jurisdiction of His Britannic Majesty's Courts shall remain in full force for this purpose.

The execution of the judgment rendered in any such pending case shall be carried out by the International Courts.

In witness whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Protocol and affixed their seals.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 23, 1909.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to request that you will take into consideration the enclosed papers, as marked in the accompanying list, relative to the claim of the representatives of William Webster, a United States citizen, for reparation for the seizure and sale of large tracts of land in New Zealand to which he had acquired the title, and of which he was in possession before the acquisition of that colony by the British Government in 1840.

The origin and early history of the claim are fully shown in the letter from the Colonial Office of the 19th July, 1893 (Paper A), but the merits of the case itself, which formed the subject of a report by your predecessors in office on the 15th December, 1890 (Paper B), are not now in question, but rather its validity as an existing claim.

I am to explain that negotiations have for some time been in progress between His Majesty's Government and the United States for the reference to arbitration of certain specified pecuniary claims of the subjects or citizens of either country against the Government of the other. A copy of the draft convention which has been the result of those negotiations is enclosed herewith (Paper C).

Among other claims against His Majesty's Government the United States Government are anxious to refer to arbitration that of W. Webster above referred to.

To this course there are objections on several grounds, but for the purpose of this reference I need only call your attention to that created by the convention (Paper D) concluded between Her late Majesty's Government and the United States Government on the 8th February, 1853, which provided for the reference to an arbitral commission of the claims of subjects or citizens of either country against the Government of the other. Under article 5 of that convention the high contracting parties engaged to consider the result of the proceedings of the commission "as a full, perfect, and final settlement of every claim upon either Government, arising out of any transaction of a date prior to the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention," and further engaged "that every such claim, whether or not the same may have been presented to the notice of, made, preferred, or laid before the said commission, shall, from and after the conclusion of the proceedings of the said commission, be considered and treated as finally settled, barred, and thenceforth inadmissible."

William Webster land claims in New Zealand: As to submitting to Arbitration.

The commission concluded their sittings in 1854, no claim on behalf of Webster having been presented.

In order to provide for the submission of Mr. Webster's claim to arbitration the United States Government introduced into article 1, paragraph 2, of the original draft of the convention at present under negotiation a clause intended to remove the bar imposed by the treaty of 1853 (see Papers E and F). This clause was subsequently abandoned, and need not therefore be now further considered (see Paper G), but the United States Government continued to press for the inclusion of the claim in some form, on the ground that if reference to it be omitted in the convention it would certainly be inserted by the Senate when the agreement comes before it for acceptance (cf. Mr. Bryce's telegram No. 30 of the 5th February, 1909, and his Excellency's despatch No. 32 of the 2nd February, 1909, Papers H and I).

His Majesty's Government, while unwilling to jeopardise the whole convention, feel unable, apart from other considerations, to include the claim, as it has hitherto been held to be barred by treaty, and the United States Government have in these circumstances suggested as a means of meeting the difficulty that the simple issue should be referred to arbitration of whether or not the claim is barred by the convention of 1853.

This proposal has been placed before the Government of New Zealand, who hesitate to assent to it, and have expressed the desire to be furnished with the views of the Law Officers of the Crown. They state that, with every desire not to embarrass His Majesty's Government or to jeopardise the proposed convention, they feel that an arbitration tribunal is not a suitable tribunal to decide a purely legal question, and that the position hitherto maintained on the main question will be much prejudiced if arbitration is agreed to on the legal point and the award decides that the claim is not barred.

In these circumstances, and in order to strengthen the hands of His Majesty's Government in discussing the question with the New Zealand Premier, who is expected to reach London next week, Sir E. Grey would be glad if you would favour him with your opinion on the question whether or not the Webster claim is barred by the convention of 1853, and as to the propriety of submitting that question to arbitration.

It is believed that the United States Government have no great confidence in obtaining a favourable award, but that on political grounds they are influenced by the desire to be enabled to give a final answer to the influential parties by whom the claim is constantly and persistently put forward.

In view of the early arrival of the New Zealand Premier, Sir E. Grey would be glad to receive a reply to this reference at your earliest convenience.

I have, &c.

Law Officers of the Crown to Colonial Office.

My Lord,

Law Officers' Department, December 22, 1909.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified to us in Sir Francis Hopwood's letter of the 6th November last, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us, for our consideration, a copy of a Memorandum from the United States Ambassador, in which he called attention on behalf of his Government to the question of fishery rights in Hecate Strait, together with a despatch on the subject from the Governor-General of Canada.

Claim of Canada to exclusive fisheries in Hecate Strait.

That it would be observed that the Canadian Government contended that "the line of demarcation" mentioned in Article III of the Anglo-Russian Treaty of 1825 and determined by the Award of the Arbitration Tribunal of 1903 must be interpreted as a line of territorial demarcation, and that, as a consequence, Canada claimed exclusive jurisdiction over the whole of Hecate Strait.

That Sir Francis Hopwood was to inclose a copy of Mr. Whitelaw Reid's note of the 8th July, 1908, asking for permission on behalf of his Government to lay a cable through Hecate Strait and Dixon Entrance, to which reference was made in the Minute of the Canadian Privy Council.

That Sir Francis Hopwood was to request us take the papers into our consideration and report whether, in our opinion, the claim of the Canadian Government could properly be supported by His Majesty's Government, having regard to the special and peculiar considerations on which it was based.

We have taken the matter into our consideration, and, in obedience to your Lordship's commands, have the honour to

Report—

That we have carefully considered the claim by the Canadian Government to the exclusive right of fishing in Dixon Entrance and Hecate Strait, and, although that claim may well be supported by many cogent arguments, we are, on the whole, of opinion that it cannot be justified either by international law or by Treaty rights. We are also of opinion that, notwithstanding the admission of the claim to British jurisdiction over those waters contained in Mr. Whitelaw Reid's despatch of the 8th July, 1908, there has been nothing in the conduct of the Governments or communities concerned to prevent the United States Government from now disputing the claim. So far as the general principles of international law are concerned, we think that any International Tribunal would certainly hold that the great spaces of water intervening on the north and east between Queen Charlotte Island and the nearest land are open sea, over which neither the United States nor Great Britain or Canada can claim exclusive jurisdiction; but it is suggested in the Report of the 6th July, 1909, of the Canadian Privy Council that there are special circumstances which justify such a claim in this case. By the Treaty of 1825 between Great Britain and Russia, which settles the boundary between Canada and Alaska, it is laid down (Article I) that the respective subjects of the Contracting Parties should have free right of fishing in any part of the Pacific Ocean. By Article III of the same Treaty, together with the Award, under the Treaty of 1903 "the line of demarcation between the possessions of the High Contracting Parties upon the coast of the continent and the islands of North America to the north-west" is directed to be drawn so as to pass over sea as well as land, and it is contended in the Report to which we have referred that the effect of this demarcation was to assign the sea as well as the islands and mainland lying north and south of that line to the High Contracting Parties respectively. That is not the construction which would be given to the Treaty if due regard be had to the well-known rule of international law as to the freedom of the open sea and to Article I of the Treaty.

The line was intended to delimit the territorial possessions of England and Russia on either side, and this would include territorial waters, but it would not purport to make waters territorial which, by international law, should properly be regarded as free and open sea. If that had been the intention, it ought, and most probably would, have been explicitly stated in the Treaty, as the Contracting Parties could scarcely have failed to realize that in such a case they were acting in disregard of an international right. The line of demarcation as drawn by the Arbitration Tribunal under the Convention of 1903 is referred to in the Convention and in the Canadian Report as a "boundary-line," and an inference is thereupon sought to be drawn that whatever lies to the north or south of that line, whether land or water, would be within the territory of one or other of the Contracting Parties. This, however, is to construe the expression boundary-line in rather too literal a sense. If it were treated literally as a "boundary-line," it would have the effect of allocating to Canada part of the territorial water at the extreme points of the line where it rests upon the coasts of Alaska, and at all intermediate points where it is drawn within 3 miles of such coasts. This cannot have been intended. The Canadian Report urges with great force an argument to which a clear and positive answer is by no means easy, namely, that the claim of territoriality, say, over Clarence Strait on the north or the Straits of Georgia or San Juan de Fuca on the south, where each of the Contracting Parties admits the claim of the other, would apply with equal cogency to Hecate Strait or Dixon Entrance. We think, however, that there is a difference which, although it may be described as being one of degree, nevertheless puts Hecate Strait and Dixon Entrance in a substantially different category from any of the other named straits. The other straits are much more of the nature of inclosed waters than of open sea, although they are connected with the open sea at both ends. It must be admitted, however, that the Award of the German Emperor under the Treaties of Washington of 1846 and 1871, which has been construed practically as treating the Strait of San Juan de Fuca as divided between the territories of Great Britain and the United States, would have some weight before an International Tribunal in favour of the contention of the British Government with regard to Hecate Strait.

Next as to the admissions on the part of the United States in favour of the British contention. We attach no importance to the statement of Mr. Alexander, the United States fishery expert, in 1897. He had no sort of authority or position which could give any weight to the statements made by him in a matter of diplomacy.

Mr. Whitelaw Reid's application of July 1908 for permission to lay a cable through Hecate Strait and Dixon Entrance, together with his express recognition that those waters are British, is undoubtedly an important point in favour of Canada, but it is to be remembered that on previous occasions, in 1897 and 1905, when the present claim had been put forward on behalf of His Majesty's Government, the United States had vigorously protested, and we had taken no action even by way of reply to their protest. This circumstance gives an aspect of inadvertence to Mr. Whitelaw Reid's admission, unless, indeed, his admission was intended only to apply to waters within the 3-mile limit which might be touched by the cable in Hecate Strait. In any event, we think that such an admission does not estop the United States from raising the point now.

[May 28, 1909.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Venezuelan surtax of 30 per cent.
on imports from foreign Colonies.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to inclose, for your consideration, the papers noted in the accompanying list respecting the surtax of 30 per cent. imposed by the Venezuelan Government in 1882 on imports from foreign Colonies.

By Article 4 of the Treaty between this country and Colombia, of which the present Republic of Venezuela was formerly an integral part, of the 18th April, 1825, "no higher duties shall be imposed on importation in the territories of Colombia of any articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of Her Britannic Majesty's

Foreign Office, April 28, 1909.

Dominions than are or shall be payable on the like articles, being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any foreign country." A copy of this Treaty is inclosed (Paper A). The Convention between Great Britain and Venezuela of 1834, which adopted and confirmed the Treaty between Great Britain and Colombia of the 19th April, 1825, was renewed and confirmed by an exchange of notes dated the 13th February, 1903, in pursuance of Article 7 of the Protocol between Great Britain and Venezuela, signed at Washington on the same day.

A controversy arose in 1881 between the British and Venezuelan Governments owing to the imposition by the latter of 30 per cent. on the duty on all "products, goods, and effects proceeding from foreign Colonies, which may be imported through the ports of the Republic open to foreign commerce."

Copies of the Venezuelan Law of the 4th June, 1881, and of the Decree of the 12th April, 1882, for the execution of the law are inclosed (Paper B), as well as of the note from the Venezuelan Government formally announcing the imposition of the surtax (Paper C).

This 30 per cent. surtax was imposed by the Venezuelan Government admittedly as a measure of retaliation for an alleged grievance against the authorities of Trinidad, who were accused of neglecting the obligations of neutrality in regard to the proceedings of certain fugitive rebels and refugees in that island against the Government of Venezuela. This charge has been repeatedly investigated and disproved by His Majesty's Government, who have, in the meanwhile, protested against the imposition of the differential duties, and have held the Government of Venezuela responsible for the resultant injury to British trade.

On the 13th October, 1881, the then Law Officers reported that "if (as we gather will be the case), under the Law recently passed by the Government of Venezuela, articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of Her Majesty's West Indian dominions would be charged, on importation, with higher duties than are imposed on the like articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of other foreign countries, the enforcement of that Law will, in our opinion, be inconsistent with the provisions of Article 4 of the Treaty of 1825."

The Venezuelan Government eventually answered this argument, on its being addressed to them, as follows:—

"The Government of the Republic much regrets not being in accord with that of Her Britannic Majesty in their mode of viewing the question, and bases their (the Venezuelan) view upon the following reasons:

"The new Law, it is true, imposes a differential duty upon merchandize coming from the Antilles, but this duty is imposed on the merchandize of all nations, including Venezuela, so that even Venezuelan goods imported from those islands are subject to the additional duty. Thus the unequal treatment alleged in your observations does not exist.

"In Article 4, which is quoted, no obligation is imposed upon Venezuela except to levy no higher duties upon imports from the British dominions than those levied upon the most favoured flags, and, as the present Law levies differential duties upon all flags, including that of Venezuela, it does not appear to the Government that there results any infraction of the Treaty according to the tenor of Article 4."

The Venezuelan reply was referred to the Law Officers. The following paragraph occurs in the reference:—

"The Venezuelan Government argue that as all nations importing goods from the West Indian Islands will have to pay alike the increased duty of 30 per cent., Her Majesty's Government have no ground of complaint.

"It appears to Lord Granville, however, that such an argument is contrary to the express words of the Article, and that Her Majesty's Government are entitled to demand that articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British West Indian Islands, and of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions, though sent in transit through British West Indian Islands, shall be admitted into Venezuela on the same terms as the produce, &c., of France, Germany, the United States, and other nations, which may be shipped therefrom direct to Venezuela."

The Law Officers reported (June 22, 1882):—

"That the view put forward by the Venezuelan Government is, in our opinion, contrary to the express terms of Article 4 of the Treaty. If such an argument were admitted to be valid, it would be destructive of the provisions contained in that Article, for it would justify the imposition of differential duties in favour of France, for example, upon goods of the same description imported into Venezuela from France and from England. It might in that case also be said that all goods coming from France or England respectively were treated alike.

"Some difficulty is no doubt created by the fact that similar differential duties to those now in question were imposed without objection during the currency of the Treaty with Colombia, which contained a provision precisely similar to that embodied in Article 4 of the present Treaty with Venezuela.

"But we do not think that this affords any sufficient reason why Her Majesty's Government should not maintain their protest against the Decree, as being in violation of the terms of Article 4 of the Treaty."

An instruction was then addressed to Her Majesty's Minister at Caracas, the draft of which was submitted to and approved by the Law Officers. The following important passages occur in it:—

"Article 4 of the Treaty stipulates that 'no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the territories of Colombia (now Venezuela) of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of Her Britannic Majesty's dominions than are or shall be payable on the like articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country.'

"Her Majesty's Government therefore claim that such articles imported into Venezuela from Her Majesty's dominions in the West Indies shall be admitted on the same terms as similar articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of other countries imported into Venezuela direct from such other countries. The view put forward by the Venezuelan Government is contrary to the express terms of Article 4. If such an argument were admitted to be valid, it would be destructive of the provisions contained in that Article, as it would justify the imposition of differential duties in favour of France, for example, by a law declaring that lower duties should be paid on goods imported into Venezuela from France than on similar goods imported from England. In that case it might equally be said that all goods coming from France or from England respectively were treated alike.

"Article 4 is clear and explicit, and Her Majesty's Government are at a loss to understand how it can be contended that it refers only (as suggested by Señor Seijas) to the flag under which the goods are imported, and not to the country of their 'growth, produce, or manufacture.' As regards the fact urged by his Excellency, that Great Britain did not protest against a similar though comparatively trifling imposition of differential duties by Colombia in 1826, which was shortly afterwards removed, Her Majesty's Government cannot allow that such omission can be held to preclude them from protesting against the present grave infraction of the Treaty by Venezuela, and against the injuries thereby inflicted on British commerce."

A part of the Venezuelan argument, in reply, rested on a contention that the British Colonies were excluded from the Treaty of 1825. The only part germane to the cases under consideration is the following:—

"But the Honourable Lord Granville judges that, by Article 4 of the same Treaty, Venezuela could not impose differential duties, and, obliged as I am to justify the intention and purpose of the law bringing, for the consideration of Her Majesty's Cabinet, all that may free Venezuela from any intention opposed to the obligations prescribed by the Treaty, I trust that your Excellency and the Honourable Lord Granville will anew take into consideration that Article 4 is circumscribed to the two High Contracting Parties agreeing to the stipulation that no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation, in the ports of one or the other nation, of the products and manufactures of the dominions of the other Contracting Party than may be imposed upon the same articles of other nations, to which the law of Venezuela has been adjusted.

"Article 4, in the opinion of the Government and Congress of Venezuela, remained fully respected when, on imports in the ports of Venezuela from British Colonies, no other or higher duties were imposed than such as had to be paid by those of the Colonies of all foreign flags, and also of the national flag."

It is important, in considering the question of the interpretation of the most-favoured-nation Article in Commercial Treaties, to bear in mind that a Convention has recently been concluded, but not yet ratified, to regulate the commercial relations between Canada and France, of which Article 8, paragraph 1, is as follows:—

"To enjoy the benefits of the aforesaid Tariff advantages, products originating in France, Algeria, the French Colonies and possessions, and the territories of Indo-China shall be conveyed without transshipment from a port of those territories or from a port of a territory enjoying the preferential or intermediate Tariff into a sea or river port of Canada."

No objection to this stipulation was raised by His Majesty's Government because it did not appear to them that any country enjoying by Treaty most-favoured-nation treatment for its goods in Canada could claim the benefits of the advantages above mentioned if the goods were shipped from a port of some territory not falling within the category set forth in Article 8 of the Convention.

But it is conceivable that this differential treatment by Venezuela of the West Indian Colonies might have assumed the character of a reduction of duties for goods of, say, the French Colonies, provided they were shipped direct to that country under a Commercial Convention with France. The question would then have arisen as to whether it was open to the United Kingdom to claim for British goods, whether shipped direct or indirect, the benefit of the lower duties.

If such a claim be not warranted, it is difficult to see that the claim for the removal of the surtax of 30 per cent. can be justified in the case of goods originating not from the West Indian Colonies themselves, but from the United Kingdom, for example, and transhipped, for instance, at Trinidad.

The British Government have also contended that goods imported from His Britannic Majesty's Dominions in the West Indies are entitled to be admitted to Venezuela on the same terms as similar goods imported from any other country or place. To this the Venezuelan Government have rejoined that the words "Her Britannic Majesty's Dominions" in Article 4 must be held to mean Her Majesty's Dominions in Europe, and not to include Her Majesty's possessions abroad. There is no precedent, however, in support of such a construction, which would seem to be opposed to the plain meaning of the words of the Article, and the distinction between "the United Kingdom" and "Her Majesty's Dominions" in British Treaties is too well established to admit of any doubt on the point. The arguments adduced by the Venezuelan Government in support of their action and the contentions on the part of His Majesty's Government by which they have been met will be found in the Memorandum respecting the imposition of duties by the Venezuelan Government on goods imported from the British West India Islands (No. 9366), copy of which is inclosed (Paper D).

On the 21st February, 1887, relations between Great Britain and Venezuela were suspended by the Government of the latter country on account of the refusal of Her late Majesty's Government to evacuate the territory lying between the Orinoco and the Pomaroon Rivers.

In 1890 negotiations were opened, at the request of the Venezuelan Government, for the resumption of diplomatic relations, when Her Majesty's then Government stated that they were ready to do so on a satisfactory settlement being reached on the following three points:—

1. Settlement of the Anglo-Venezuelan boundary question by arbitration.
2. Repeal of the differential duties on imports from British Colonies.
3. The submission of certain claims to a Commission.

No advance was made in these negotiations, but on the 2nd February, 1897, a Treaty was concluded between the two Governments for the settlement of the boundary question, and relations were thereupon resumed without further reference to the remaining two points. It cannot, however, be held that His Majesty's Government have allowed their case, in the matter of the 30 per cent. import duties, to go by default, as negotiations on the subject have proceeded between the two Governments ever since, and this view has never been put forward by the Venezuelan Government.

It will be observed that, in the Treaty between this country and Colombia of 1825 no provision is made for the termination of that Agreement on any specified date, or for its denunciation by either of the Contracting Parties. In 1841, 1843, and again in 1897, the Venezuelan Government gave notice of their desire to terminate the Treaties of 1825 and 1834, and on each occasion Her late Majesty's Government declined to accept the notices, and denied the right of the Venezuelan Government to terminate the Treaties on the ground that these could only be abrogated by the mutual consent of both Contracting Parties. Moreover, in the somewhat analogous case of Honduras, when, in 1877, the Provisional President of that Republic issued a Decree denouncing certain specified Treaties with foreign Powers, the British Government, whilst accepting the denunciation of certain Treaties, protested against the denunciation of the Treaty of the 28th November, 1859, relating to the Bay Islands and Mosquito land grants, whereupon the Government of Honduras declared that they would maintain that Treaty in its integrity and fulfil their obligations to the best of their power. The same principle was, moreover, admitted by the President of the United States of America in 1857 in connection with the desire of that country to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty.

In the annex to the Protocol No. 1 of the 17th January, 1871, of the Conference which met to consider the abrogation of certain Articles of the Treaty of Paris of the 30th March, 1856 (the Treaty of Peace at the conclusion of the Crimean war), a statement will be found of the rule which Sir E. Grey understands is generally recognized in regard to the termination of Treaties to which no limit has been assigned, and I am to inclose a copy of that instrument (Paper E), the Annex to which runs as follows:—

It seems, however, open to question how far it can be maintained that a rule which was enunciated with regard to a solemn Treaty of an obviously permanent nature, drawn up and assented to by all the great European Powers in international conclave assembled, is applicable in its integrity, and in all circumstances, to every purely Commercial Convention or Agreement.

Article 4 of the Treaty of 1825 provides for most-favoured-nation treatment in Venezuela of “articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of Her Britannic Majesty's Dominions.” It appears, however, that of the goods imported into Venezuela from Trinidad a considerable proportion are of non-British origin, that island being to a large extent an entrepôt for goods in transit to Venezuela, and Sir E. Grey supposes that in any case His Majesty's Government would only be justified in requiring the Venezuelan Government to remove the surtax from goods of British origin so imported.

Recent political events in Venezuela having brought about a situation which seems conducive to a settlement of this long-outstanding difference, telegraphic instructions were sent on the 16th February last to His Majesty's Minister at Caracas to do all in his power to obtain the removal of the differential duty, basing the claim of His Majesty's Government on their rights under Article 4 of the Treaty of 1825. I am to inclose copy of a despatch which has been received from His Majesty's Minister, forwarding copy of the communication which he addressed to the Venezuelan Minister for Foreign Affairs on the 29th January last in pursuance of these instructions (Paper F), and also copy of a further despatch from Sir V. Corbett, in which attention is called to the view held in Venezuela that the claim of His Majesty's Government has been weakened by the fact that no mention was made of the surtax when that country was compelled, as a result of the blockade in 1902, to assent to the arbitration of all outstanding questions (Paper G). It may be observed that the reason of this omission on the part of His Majesty's Government was not, as appears to be thought in Venezuela, that Her late Majesty's Government were not confident of the validity of their Treaty rights, but that it was considered desirable by the then Secretary of State for the Colonies that the question of the 30 per cent. surtax should be treated on its own merits when a favourable opportunity occurred.

I am to transmit copies of the Protocol between Great Britain and Venezuela of the 13th February, 1903 (Paper H), as well as of the exchange of notes signed in pursuance thereof (Paper I). By the Protocol it is provided, among other things, that (7) “the British and Venezuelan Governments agree that, inasmuch as it may be contended that the establishment of a blockade has ipso facto created a state of war and that any Treaty existing between has been thereby abrogated, it shall be recorded in an exchange of notes that the Convention of the 29th October, 1834, which adopted and confirmed, mutatis mutandis, the Treaty of the 15th April, 1825, between Great Britain and Colombia, shall be deemed to be renewed and confirmed, or provisionally renewed and confirmed, pending conclusion of a new Treaty of Amity and Commerce.” On turning, however, to the text of the notes exchanged you will see that the words underlined do not occur therein.

A telegram was received from Sir V. Corbett on the 22nd ultimo, stating that he had received an unsatisfactory reply from the Venezuelan Government to the representations which he had addressed to them. In these circumstances it seems desirable to consider the expediency of informing the Venezuelan Government that if no amicable arrangement can be reached, His Majesty's Government will be compelled to demand that the matter be referred to arbitration. Before such a step is taken, however, it would be necessary that His Majesty's Government should be advised as to whether, having regard to all the considerations which have been set forth above, the reference of the case to arbitration would have a good prospect of terminating in a decision favourable to this country.

I am accordingly to request that you will be good enough to take these papers into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir Edward Grey, at your early convenience, with your opinion as to—

1. Whether goods the produce of Trinidad are entitled under the Treaty of 1825 to enter Venezuela at the lowest rate of duty applied to any other non-Venezuelan goods and without the imposition of the surtax.

2. Whether other British goods transhipped at Trinidad are entitled to similar treatment.

3. Whether goods neither British nor Venezuelan, nor enjoying any right under Treaty between Venezuela and some other foreign State, are entitled by the mere fact of transshipment at Trinidad to similar treatment.

4. Whether a Commercial Treaty, such as that of 1825, which contains provision neither for termination nor modification can be held to be for ever binding, in spite of the expressed wish of one of the parties to denounce it or to negotiate an alteration in its terms.

5. Whether the position of His Majesty's Government under the Anglo-Colombian Treaty of 1825 in regard to the differential duties imposed by the Venezuelan Government is a sufficiently strong one to offer a good prospect, if recourse be had to arbitration, of a decision being given in their favour.

I am, at the same time, to request that you will be good enough to favour Sir Edward Grey with any general observations which you may have to offer on the subject.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 30, 1909.

WITH reference to the letter from this Office of the 28th instant, submitting certain questions in connection with the surtax of 30 per cent. imposed on goods imported into Venezuela from the British West India Colonies, I have the honour, by the direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit copy of a further despatch which has been received from His Majesty's Minister at Caracas,* together with copy of correspondence respecting the Commercial Treaty between Great Britain and Venezuela,† which contains the note from Dr. Rojas, referred to by Sir V. Corbett (pp. 20-21), showing the repeated efforts made by the Venezuelan Government to have a period fixed for the duration of the Agreement and to replace it by another Treaty.

Report.

1 and 2. In our opinion goods which are the produce of Trinidad, or which are of the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's dominions, ought, under the treaty of 1825, to be admitted into Venezuela at the lowest rate of duty applied to any other non-Venezuelan goods, and without the imposition of a surtax.

3. We think that similar treatment cannot be claimed in respect of the goods mentioned in this question, as the provisions of the treaty apply only to articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Majesty's dominions.

4. The question is not free from difficulty, as some of the provisions of the treaty appear to be of a permanent character, while others, namely those dealing with the commercial relations of the two countries, cannot be so regarded. On the whole, we think that the main object of the treaty is commercial, and that it would be held to be temporary in character and terminable by the withdrawal of either party on reasonable notice. It appears from the papers before us, particularly from the protocol and notes of 1903, that the treaty has been regarded by both parties as being in force up to the present, and we think that the Venezuelan Government cannot be said to have withdrawn from or denounced the treaty by reason only of their contention that it is terminable, or of their expression of a desire to determine it.

5. We presume that the question which His Majesty's Government would desire to submit to arbitration would be whether the imposition and maintenance of the surtax by the Venezuelan Government amounts to an infraction of article 4 of the treaty. On this question, which depends on the construction of the treaty, we think that His Majesty's Government would probably obtain a declaration in their favour from an impartial tribunal, in spite of the imposition without protest of similar duties during the currency of the treaty with Colombia and of the subsequent conduct of this country, if, indeed, such conduct be material. But the question as to Venezuela's right to withdraw on notice would no doubt also be considered, seeing that His Majesty's Government has hitherto denied that right. As stated above, in answer to question 4, we think the contention of Venezuela on this point would be upheld, and that the tribunal would not be likely to grant substantial damages for the infraction of a treaty to which Venezuela has only been held by a mistaken contention on the part of His Majesty's Government.

On the whole, therefore, we do not think that the position of His Majesty's Government is strong enough to make it worth while to go to arbitration.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 21, 1909.

prisoners from Zanzibar, in accordance with section 7 of "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," in order to undergo their sentences elsewhere.

A difficulty recently arose with regard to a prisoner who was sentenced to imprisonment by the British Court in Zanzibar and was ordered to be removed to Mombasa in the East Africa Protectorate for the purpose of serving his sentence. On arrival at Mombasa he was released, on the ground that the Court at Zanzibar had no power to make the order under the terms of "The Zanzibar Order in Council, 1906."

The draft of an amended Order in Council has accordingly been prepared, giving power to the Zanzibar Court to order a person who has been convicted to be removed to places which are not within the British Dominions for the purpose of undergoing his sentence. That draft has received the concurrence of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and I am to request that you will take it into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

A copy of "The Zanzibar Order in Council, 1906" (Paper C), is enclosed for convenience of reference.

[File No. 1759/09.]

No. 1.

[January 19, 1910.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, September 15, 1909.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you the accompanying papers relating to three claims advanced by the German Government on behalf of certain of their subjects.

German claims arising out of war in South Africa.

2. At intervals since the close of the South African war, the German Government have been pressing upon His Majesty's Government a large number of claims arising out of that war, and have intimated that, if His Majesty's Government are unwilling to recognize their validity, they consider that they ought to be submitted to arbitration.

3. The total number of these claims is about sixty-nine; in the great majority of cases Sir E. Grey is of opinion that sufficient reasons exist to justify him in declining altogether either to entertain the claims or to consent to their submission to arbitration.

4. With respect to the remaining claims, however, more difficult questions arise, and, as at present advised, Sir E. Grey feels that if he declines to submit the claims to arbitration he may be somewhat embarrassed to find adequate reasons for his refusal.

5. Before passing to the details of the claims, it may be well to remind you that in the year 1904 an Arbitration Agreement was concluded with Germany (Paper (A)) modelled, like many similar Agreements concluded about the same time, on that made with France in 1903. Article 1 of this Agreement provided for the reference to arbitration of differences of a legal nature, or relating to the interpretation of Treaties between the two Contracting Parties, which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, with the usual proviso excluding from the scope of the Agreement differences which affect the vital interests, the independence or the honour of the parties, or which concern the interests of third parties. It is under the provisions of this Agreement that Germany maintains that these claims should be referred to arbitration.

6. Another consideration which Sir E. Grey thinks it desirable should be borne in mind is the attitude this country adopted in connection with obligatory arbitration at the Second Peace Conference at The Hague in 1907. Great Britain played a prominent part at that Conference in supporting the various schemes and propositions that were put forward for extending the scope of obligatory arbitration. On the other hand, Germany took the foremost part in opposing them, and you will therefore readily understand that Sir E. Grey is reluctant to place His Majesty's Government in a position which would have the appearance of being inconsistent with the attitude they instructed the British Delegates to adopt at The Hague. For this reason he would prefer not to decline to submit these claims to arbitration unless it is quite clear that there are sufficient reasons for so doing.

7. The particular claims as to which Sir E. Grey desires your advice are three in number: That of Messrs. Plettner Brothers, that of Kraeber, and that of the Hamburg underwriters. The facts with reference to each of these claims are set out in separate Memoranda (Papers (B), (C), (D)), because as to the facts there is practically no dispute. It will be seen that each claim raises a clear legal issue, viz., whether, when Great Britain annexed the territories of the South African Republic and the Orange Free State, so that those two States ceased to exist as States, she inherited the liability of those States in respect of claims against them by individual foreigners for breach of contract or for torts committed by the officials of those Governments; and it is this question which Germany claims to refer to arbitration under the 1904 Agreement.

8. Up till now the only argument which has been used by Sir E. Grey in his correspondence with the German Government against the submission of the claims to arbitration under the 1904 Agreement is that that Agreement is not retrospective, and that therefore these claims are not within its scope. These claims must have arisen either in 1902, when the Republics were annexed, or, except as to the claim of the Hamburg underwriters, in 1903, when the mining plans which the claimants had prepared were rejected.

9. Sir E. Grey is advised, however, that it is open to question whether this argument is relevant. It will be noticed that the "differences" which are under the Agreement to be referred to arbitration are differences of a particular type, namely, "which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy"; and it may well be argued that it is not until diplomatic negotiations with regard to a particular question have failed to achieve a settlement that any obligation is imposed upon the parties to the 1904 Agreement to refer it to arbitration. The diplomatic negotiations with regard to the claims under consideration did not finish until after the making of the 1904 Agreement, as will be seen from the précis contained in Paper (E).

10. It is true the German Government had suggested arbitration on South African war claims generally in 1904. This proposal, however, had reference more particularly to claims which had been disallowed on the grounds that the claimants had been guilty of breaches of neutrality. Even assuming, therefore, that the Agreement of 1904 is not retrospective in character, it is not clear that His Majesty's Government would be justified thereby in maintaining that they were under no obligation to refer these claims to arbitration.

11. As to the question whether the Agreement is or is not retrospective, it will be noticed that the English text—"differences which may arise of a legal nature, or relating to the interpretation of Treaties existing between the two Contracting Parties, and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the Permanent Court of Arbitration established at The Hague by the Convention of the 29th July, 1899; provided, nevertheless, that they do not affect the vital interests, the independence, or the honour of the two Contracting States, and do not concern the interests of third Parties"—lends itself more readily to the interpretation that it is not retrospective than the German, which may be translated literally as follows: "Contentious questions of law and contentions which relate to the interpretation of Treaties existing between the two Contracting Parties shall, in so far as it may not have been possible to settle them by diplomatic means, be referred to the Permanent Court of Arbitration established at The Hague by the Convention of the 29th July, 1899. It is, however, at the same time to be understood that such contentions do not affect the vital interests, the independence, or the honour of the two Contracting States, and do not concern the interests of third Parties." That is, the words "which may arise" have no counterpart in the German.

12. It has also been suggested that if His Majesty's Government rely only on the argument that the Agreement of 1904 is not retrospective, the German Government may contend that the question is itself a difference of a legal nature which it would be proper to refer to arbitration under the Agreement. It seems improbable that the Agreement was meant to bind the parties to refer to arbitration differences as to the interpretation of the very instrument creating the obligation, but it is difficult to point to any words in Article 1 which specifically exclude this contention.

13. A further difficulty in relying upon the argument that these Arbitration Agreements are not to be construed retrospectively is that, on the 4th April, 1908, an Agreement in similar terms was signed with the United States Government. Under that Agreement the Newfoundland fisheries disputes between this country and the United States, which have continued intermittently since 1818 are now being referred to arbitration; yet these disputes had certainly passed out of the category of disputes which diplomacy could settle before the making of the 1908 Agreement, as the two Powers had agreed in 1907 that the disputes should be settled by arbitration. The "compromis," however, Parliamentary Papers, United States, No. 1, 1909 (Paper (F)) is headed "Special Agreement for the submission of Questions relating to Fisheries on the North Atlantic Coast under the General Convention of Arbitration concluded between Great Britain and the United States on the 4th April, 1908," so that, in fact, His Majesty's Government have acquiesced in giving a retrospective effect to the 1908 Agreement with the United States Government.

14. On the other hand Lord Crewe has repeatedly impressed upon Sir E. Grey the grave inconvenience which would ensue from arbitration of these claims if the award were adverse.

15. The German claims raising this point number only three, but a number of other claims, both by foreigners and British subjects, some of them involving large sums, have been made at different times. The inclosed Memorandum (Paper (G)) drawn up in the Colonial Office in 1903, with opinions of Law Officers given on some of the cases, though not a complete list, will show that a number of claims have been made on the ground that His Majesty's Government, as successor to the South African Republic, has taken over its liabilities, whether arising from contract or tort, a view which His Majesty's Government and the Transvaal Government have steadily declined to recognize. In this connection I am to draw attention to the inclosed opinion of Professor Meili (Inclosure H) on the claims of the Netherlands South African Railway, in pp. 23 to 36 of which he argues against the disclaimer of obligations for contractual debts of the late Republic. His Majesty's Government, after long correspondence, succeeded in settling the claims of the Company without recognizing the concession or making any admission of liability for the obligations undertaken by the late Republic, but a decision, in which the general principles advocated, e.g., by V. Martens, quoted by Professor Meili (p. 31), were laid down, would very possibly result in reopening this and other cases.

16. It is not possible from the nature of the case to estimate the amount which would be involved in such a decision, but it would undoubtedly be very large, and the inconvenience and disturbance of settled cases which would result in South Africa, despite the fact that His Majesty's Government is prepared to take all pecuniary liability, are in Lord Crewe's opinion much to be deprecated.

17. Sir E. Grey is fully alive to the extreme inconvenience of an adverse decision, but he is disposed to doubt whether in the long run it may not be more to the interest of this country to pay these claims, if it is just that they should be paid by His Majesty's Government, rather than to be the occasion of any set back to the progress of the cause of International Arbitration.

18. Before arriving at any final conclusion, however, on this point, he is anxious to obtain your opinion as to the probability of an adverse decision if the claims are referred to arbitration.

19. To justify an award in favour of the claimants, it would be necessary for the Court to hold that a State annexing the territory of another State after conquest is bound to discharge unliquidated claims which had previously been brought against the latter. So far as Sir E. Grey is aware, there are no precedents to show that any State annexing the territory of a conquered State has ever admitted liability of this kind; to the extent to which the matter rests on international practice, therefore Sir E. Grey knows of no authority which would justify the Court in imposing liability on His Majesty's Government to pay these claims. There are, it is true, certain passages in some of the text-book writers which appear to maintain that the annexing State succeeds to all the liabilities of the former State, but he has not been able to find any precedent exactly in point showing that a nation annexing the territory of another State after conquest has regarded itself as bound by international law and apart from any special agreement to render itself liable either for the executory contracts or the torts of the extinct State.

20. A certain amount of information on the subject, together with such authorities as there are, will be found collected or referred to on pp. 303-429 of volume i of "Moore's Digest of International Law." The case most in point seems to be that of the Hawaiian claims referred to on p. 337, where the opinion of the American Attorney-General Griggs is cited. This opinion will be found on pp. 583-8 of the accompanying volume of the "Opinions of Attorneys-General," volume xxii (Paper (I)). Further information with regard to the facts in some of the Hawaiian claims can be supplied if desired, as the claimants in many cases were British subjects.

21. It may perhaps be desirable to add that, in so far as international law does impose an obligation upon a conquering or annexing State, to take over liability for the funded debt of the annexed territory, it may be claimed that the obligation was fairly fulfilled after the annexation of the Republics. Information as to the exact action taken by His Majesty's Government (which did, however, involve some loss to the bondholders), will be found in the Colonial Office Memorandum already referred to.

22. The questions of the liability of His Majesty's Government for debts and liabilities of the Boer Republics is dealt with or touched upon in the following references to your predecessors, and copies of those references and of their reports are enclosed for convenience of reference (Paper (J)).

23. In 1905 certain British underwriters with claims very similar to those of the German claim of the Hamburg underwriters brought a petition of right against the Crown, seeking to make the Crown liable for gold seized by the Government of the South African Republic on the eve of the outbreak of the Boer War. The Divisional Court held that there was no principle of international law rendering the Crown liable in such a case. (West Rand Central Gold Mining Company v. Rex, L. R. 2 K. B. 391). A copy of the shorthand notes of the case can be supplied if desired.

24. Up till now the German Government have not, in their communications to Sir E. Grey, set out any arguments in favour of their contention that Great Britain has become liable for claims as successor to the South African Republic.

25. I am to ask you to take these papers into your consideration and favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion upon the following questions:—

(1.) Whether His Majesty's Government are bound by the terms of the Arbitration Agreement of 1904 with Germany to refer to arbitration a "difference" within the scope of that Agreement which arose before 1904, and as to which it was clear before 1904 that it could not be settled by diplomatic negotiation: i.e., is the Agreement retrospective in character?

(2.) Whether, assuming that the Agreement of 1904 is not retrospective in character, His Majesty's Government are bound to refer these claims to arbitration under the Agreement in view of the fact that, though they arose out of incidents that took place before 1904, the diplomatic discussion of these claims did not terminate until after 1904?

(3.) Whether, if His Majesty's Government refuse to submit the claims to arbitration under the Agreement of 1904 on the ground that it is not retrospective in character, Germany would be entitled to claim to refer that point to arbitration under the Agreement.

(4.) Whether the position adopted by Great Britain on the question of her non-liability for claims of this character against the extinct Republics is good in law?

(5.) Whether her position is strong enough to render it safe under all the circumstances for His Majesty's Government to accept arbitration upon the point?

26. I am at the same time to ask you to favour Sir E. Grey with any general observations on the subject which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.

Report.

ALTHOUGH the words "which may arise" in the English text of the Arbitration Agreement of 1904 give rise to some difficulty, we think, on the whole, that the Agreement would be held to be retrospective in character. Its object was to introduce, in cases of minor importance, a general system of arbitration between the two countries, and there seems no reason for excluding from its scope differences existing when it was made.

Apart from the language of the Agreement itself, we think that the fact that Great Britain has acquiesced in an interpretation giving a retrospective effect to a similar Agreement would afford a reason for construing the Agreement of 1904 in the same way.

2. Assuming, contrary to our view, that the Agreement is not retrospective, we do not think that a difference arising before the date of the Agreement would come under it merely because the diplomatic negotiations are not concluded at the date of the Agreement.

3. We see nothing in the language of the Agreement to support a suggestion that the interpretation of the Agreement itself is excluded from the obligation to refer and consequently, in the absence of any circumstances pointing to a contrary conclusion, we think that this question must be answered in the affirmative.

We now proceed to deal with the claims now in question.

4 and 5. The claims of Plettner Brothers, and Kraeber, arise out of ordinary commercial transactions by the late Government, and we do not think that His Majesty's Government would be able to maintain a successful defence to these claims before the Arbitration Tribunal.

We think the claim of the Hamburg Underwriters stands on a different footing, and that international law would impose on Great Britain no obligation to satisfy this claim, unless the seizure of the gold were shown to be a lawful act on the part of the Transvaal Government; and, even in that case, we think that His Majesty's Government would have a good defence if they could satisfy the Tribunal that the liability of the Transvaal Government in respect of the seizure, was incurred for the purpose of preparing for, or prosecuting, the war against Great Britain.

[Paper (B).]

Claim of Messrs. Plettner Brothers.

ON the 6th April, 1899, Messrs. Plettner, of Halle, received an order from the Government of the South African Republic for some model mining plans, with the object of facilitating the superintendence and control by the Government over mining operations in the Transvaal. The war broke out before they could be finished, and consequently they were not delivered to the South African authorities. After the conclusion of peace the British Mines Department at Johannesburg declined to accept the plans.

Subsequently Messrs. Plettner put in a claim for 2,565 marks (428*l.*) for the execution of the plans plus interest at 5 per cent. from the 1st April, 1900.

[Paper (C).]

Claim of Herr Kraeber.

On the 6th April, 1899, Herr Kraeber, of Nordhausen, a German surveyor of mines, was instructed by the Government of the South African Republic to give any information which might be required to the firm of Plettner Brothers, of Halle, who were engaged in printing model plans of mines for that Government, and, if desired, to proceed to Halle for a personal discussion of the subject. His expenses and fees were to be assessed at the rates prevailing in Germany for mining engineers.

Kraeber carried out his instructions up to the end of January 1900. His duties consisted in reading the proof sheets and carrying on a continual correspondence with the firm of Plettner Brothers, and he also undertook a journey from Kohlscheid, near Aix-la-Chapelle, where he was living at the time, to Halle, in order to have a personal interview with Messrs. Plettner.

In due course Kraeber forwarded his account, amounting to 480 marks (24*l.*), to the Consul-General of the South African Republic at Amsterdam. The latter acknowledged receipt of this account on the 31st January, 1900, and stated that it would be forwarded to his Government.

Kraeber, however, was unable to obtain any payment from the Government of the South African Republic; but, in reply to a reminder addressed to the Consul-General of the Republic at Amsterdam, was assured, in a letter dated the 2nd December, 1901, that the statute of limitations would not be invoked with regard to his account.

Since the incorporation of the South African Republic in the British Empire Kraeber approached the German Government with a view to their obtaining the payment of his claim, stated to be due to him by the British Government as the legal successor to the obligations of the South African Republic.

[Paper (D).]

Claim of the Association of Hamburg Underwriters.

The Association of Hamburg Underwriters took over in May 1899 on account of the Dresdner Bank under a current policy the insurance of the carriage of raw gold from South Africa. The insurance policy came into force on the 13th May, 1899, and covered all risks of carriage from the moment when the gold was taken from the coin plates.

At the beginning of 1899 the Dresdner Bank had entered into communication through their branch establishment in London with their agents, the General Mining and Finance Corporation (Limited) in Johannesburg, in regard to the purchase on behalf of the Deutsche Reichsbank of the gold produced by various mines connected with the General Mining and Finance Company. The negotiations were concluded by a written communication, dated the 22nd April, 1899, from the branch establishment of the Dresdner Bank in London and their telegram of the 12th May, 1899. The General Mining and Finance Company were instructed thereby to commence shipment of the gold as soon as possible. As far as the telegram dealt with the insurance it served to inform the General Mining and Finance Company that the policy had been taken out at the rate of 3*s.* 6*d.* per 100*l.* to cover all risks. The Dresdner Bank declared their readiness to take, if necessary, 1*s.* per 100*l.* of this themselves, while the rest of the amount to be paid as insurance was to be deducted on account of the mines in the final settlement of the purchase price.

In a letter dated the 15th May, 1899, the General Mining and Finance Company informed the branch of the Dresdner Bank in London that they would at once instruct a number of mines to ship their gold production to the head offices of the Reichsbank at Hamburg. The branch of the Dresdner Bank received this letter at the beginning of June 1899.

The General Mining and Finance Company thereupon concluded the purchase of the raw gold of the mines through their mainman [sic] (? President) and Managing Director, George Albu, who was at the same time Managing Director of the gold mines in question, and who arranged verbally with the Bank of Natal at Johannesburg that the latter should receive the bar gold to be sold to the Dresdner Bank from the following mines:—

Aurora West United Gold Mining Company (Limited).
Van Ryn Gold Mines Estate (Limited).
New Goet Gold Mines (Limited).
Meyer and Charlton Gold Mining Company (Limited).
Roodeport United Gold Mining Company (Limited), and should ship it to Hamburg to the head-quarters of the Reichsbank there. The Bank of Natal were further, on delivery of the gold to them, to discount the bills drawn by the mines on the branch of the Dresdner Bank in London.

On the 2nd and 5th October, 1899, the quantities of gold quoted in Enclosures 4 to 7 according to weight, marks, and packing, were delivered from the mines specified. The Bank of Natal received the gold and furnished certificates as to its delivery, which certificates were annexed by the mines to the bills drawn by them against the gold on the branch of the Dresdner Bank in London. These bills, payable at sight, amounting in all to 35,600*l.*, were discounted by the Bank of Natal and sent to the branch of the Dresdner Bank in London, which met them on the 24th October, 1899.

The gold bars were packed in cases and dispatched by the Bank of Natal, and every case was marked with the name of the mine from which the gold it contained had been extracted.

On or about the 10th October, 1899, the Government of the then South African Republic seized the whole of the gold delivered to the Bank of Natal for the Dresdner Bank, viz.:—

1. Sixteen cases of raw gold (5,995·90 oz.) which were in the mail train at Vereeniging Station on the Netherland South African Railway Company's system.

2. Nine bars of gold (3,424 oz.) at the Bank of Natal in Johannesburg itself; or together, 9,419·90 oz. of battery and cyanide gold of a total value of 712,762 marks (35,638*l.*).

The seizure of the gold was effected on the ground of a Decree issued on the 27th September, 1899, by the Administrative Council of the South African Republic to the effect that gold extracted by mine owners in time of war must be deposited for keeping with the Government of the South African Republic. At the close of the war the gold, or its value, would be returned to the rightful owners after certain deductions to be fixed by law.

A further Decree of the Administrative Council, dated the 12th October, 1899, laid down that during the war all raw gold found or extracted in the South African Republic must pass through the hands of the head of the Mines Department, who would furnish an official acknowledgment of the receipt of the goods.

In execution of this latter Decree, receipts were furnished by the head of the Mines Department on the 5th and 20th November, 1899.

A further notification on the part of the Government of the South African Republic that they would return or refund the value of gold which had been seized is contained in a letter dated the 12th October, 1899, from Secretary of State Reitz to the then Imperial German Consul at Pretoria, who had, on the 6th October, 1899, already protested verbally and in writing against the seizure. In this letter Secretary of State Reitz stated that the gold could not be released, the intention being to retain it till after the war and then to return it to its legal owners.

The losses, amounting to 712,762 marks, incurred by the Dresdner Bank through the seizure of the gold bars, were refunded to them on the 24th October, 1900, by the insurers—the Association of Hamburg Underwriters.

Of the seized gold bars, one and a-half bars, which were found after the close of the British South African war in the mint at Pretoria, were handed over to the branch of the Dresdner Bank in London by the British Government. The value of this gold amounted to 72,844·35 marks (3,642*l.*), and this sum was refunded to the Association of Hamburg Underwriters. The actual losses, therefore, amount to 712,762 less 72,844·35 marks=639,917·65 marks (31,995*l.*).

The claim of the Dresdner Bank against the South African Republic for a refund is, in consequence of the payment made by the insurers—the Association of Hamburg Underwriters—transferred to the latter by legal cession.

*Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.*Anglo-Belgian
Extradition Treaty: as to alteration of article 6.

THE Secretary of State desires to have the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown on the question whether article 6 of the Extradition Treaty between Great Britain and Belgium and article 7 of the treaty between Great Britain and Germany give proper effect to the requirements of "The Extradition Act, 1870."

To understand the question which has arisen it is necessary to refer to two previous occasions upon which the Law Officers have been consulted.

In 1874 one Bourdiol was extradited from England to Belgium, and in the following year the French Government requested the Belgian Government to re-extradite him to France at the expiration of the sentence which he was then serving in Belgium.

The Law Officers were asked whether such re-extradition would constitute a violation of the Anglo-Belgian Treaty of 1872, and they advised that, though there was nothing in that treaty to prevent Bourdiol's surrender to France, the treaty must be governed by the Extradition Act of 1870, of which section 3, sub-section (2) would prevent his surrender.

The point was then referred to the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cairns), who advised that, as Bourdiol had been surrendered to and was under the control of Belgium, Her late Majesty's Government could not exact from her more than was stipulated by the treaty of 1872. He held, however, that the treaty, by departing from the words of the Act of 1870, had left a loophole by which the obvious purpose of the Act was frustrated.

In accordance with the Lord Chancellor's opinion, no objection was offered by Her late Majesty's Government to the re-extradition of Bourdiol by Belgium to France.

Section 3 (2) of the Extradition Act of 1870 is as follows:—

"3 (2).—A fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered to a foreign State unless provision is made by the law of that State, or by arrangement, that the fugitive criminal shall not, until he has been restored or had an opportunity of returning to Her Majesty's dominions, be detained or tried in that foreign State for any offence committed prior to his surrender other than the extradition crime proved by the facts on which the surrender is grounded."

Article 6 of the Anglo-Belgian Treaty of 1872, and of the subsisting Anglo-Belgian Treaty of 1901, is as follows:—

"Where any person shall have been surrendered by either of the high contracting parties to the other, such person shall not, until he has been restored, or had an opportunity of returning to the country from whence he was surrendered, be triable or tried for any offence committed in the other country prior to the surrender, other than the particular offence on account of which he was surrendered."

It will be observed that the words "in that foreign State" in the Act apply to the words "detained or tried," and there is no limitation as to the place where the offence may have been committed, whereas in the treaty the words "in the other country" apply to the words "offence committed." Also in the treaty the word "triable" is substituted for the word "detained" in the Act.

In the year 1882 the question again came up for consideration in connection with the similar case of one Hamel, who had been extradited from England to Germany, and whose re-extradition from Germany was requested by the French Government.

Article 7 of the Anglo-German Treaty is as follows:—

"A person surrendered can in no case be kept in prison or be brought to trial in the State to which the surrender has been made for any other crime or on account of any other matters than those for which the extradition shall have taken place."

"This stipulation does not apply to crimes committed after the extradition."

BELGIUM.

It will be observed that the wording of this article more nearly provides the "arrangement" required by section 3 (2) of the Act of 1870 than does the corresponding article 6 of the Belgian Treaty. The prohibition against prosecution for any crime other than that for which extradition has been granted is absolute, and is not limited to crimes committed in Germany. The words "kept in prison or be brought to trial" are, however, substituted for the words "detained or tried" in the Act.

The Law Officers were asked to advise whether, in view of section 3 (2) of the Act of 1870 and article 7 of the Anglo-German Treaty, the Secretary of State would be justified in consenting to the proposed surrender of Hamel by Germany to France.

The Law Officers' opinion was as follows:—

"We answer the question 'whether the Secretary of State would be justified in consenting to the proposed surrender of Hamel to France' by saying that we are of opinion that the German authorities will be justified in surrendering Hamel to France, and that the consent of the Secretary of State is not necessary to justify that surrender. The power to surrender an extradited criminal (under the circumstances mentioned) to a third country appears to us to exist, and whilst the consent of the Secretary of State cannot confer that power if it does not exist, neither can the refusal of such consent interfere with the power if it does exist."

"Circumstances may occur, such as the obtaining of the extradition of a prisoner in order to deliver him over to a third country to be tried for a political offence which might give this country a right to complain, but no such question arises in this case."

The case submitted to the Law Officers and their opinion as attached hereto.

The German Government were accordingly informed that, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, there was no objection to the further extradition to France of the man Hamel, and that the consent of His Majesty's Government to such a step was not necessary.

Another case has now occurred under the Anglo-Belgian Treaty.

In September 1907 one Colley alias Kuhliger was extradited from this country to Belgium to take his trial on charges of fraud, and was sentenced in Belgium on the 18th December, 1907, to a term of two years' imprisonment. In October 1908 the German Government applied to Belgium for this man's surrender to them on a charge of counterfeiting documents.

The Belgian Government replied that, having regard to the provisions of article 6 of the Anglo-Belgian Extradition Treaty, they could not authorise Kuhliger's extradition from Belgium to Germany.

The German Government then approached the Government of this country, referring to the case of Hamel (see above), and asked them to act on the view then expressed, and to inform the Belgian Government that they had no objection to the man's extradition from Belgium to Germany.

His Majesty's Government, following the precedents afforded by the cases of Bourdiol and Hamel, informed the Belgian authorities that they were not precluded by the terms of article 6 of the treaty from re-extraditing Kuhliger to Germany, and that the British Government had no objection to their doing so.

The Belgian Government, however, strongly protest against the view taken by His Majesty's Government. Their contention is as follows:—

If, as the British Government hold, article 6 of the treaty does not preclude the man's surrender from Belgium to Germany, because "any other offence" in that article (see above) only applies to offences committed in the United Kingdom or Belgium, it will follow that it does not prevent his trial in Belgium for the offence committed in Germany. Thus, although the Belgian Government could not prosecute an extradé for another offence of an extraditable character committed in Belgium, they could prosecute him for a non-extraditable offence committed in Germany. They are strongly of opinion that the prohibition against prosecution for any offence other than that in respect of which a person has been extradited extends to preclude his re-extradition to a third Power; but, if the contrary view taken by His Majesty's Government is to be maintained, they propose that the treaty may be amended so as to make this view clear. They also propose to insert in the new treaty various other provisions which would be obviously inconsistent with section 3 (2) of the Act.

In view of the attitude adopted by the Belgian Government, it has become necessary to decide what arrangement is required by section 3 (2) of the Act of 1870, and whether the treaties concluded with Belgium and Germany comply with the terms of that section.

Article 7 of the German Treaty does not follow the wording of the Act exactly, but, so far as the right of re-extradition is concerned, there is a close correspondence between the two, and the Law Officers' opinion of 1882, that "power to surrender an extradited criminal to a third country exists," may perhaps be taken to mean that under the Extradition Act there is no obligation on His Majesty's Government to provide against the surrender to a third State of a person surrendered from this country. If this is the correct view of section 3 (2) of the Act, article 6 of the Belgian Treaty, though it does not follow the words of the Act, sufficiently carries out the intention of it in this respect.

It is submitted, however, that the opinions of the Law Officers of 1874 and of Lord Cairns are the more correct, and that re-extradition to a third Power is precluded by the terms of section 3 (2) of the Act of 1870, and ought to be precluded by treaties intended to embody the arrangement prescribed by that section.

Parliament in 1870 put many restrictions on the extradition of accused persons, and limited somewhat narrowly the offences for which they could be surrendered. Could it be intended that if a fugitive in the United Kingdom has committed offences in two foreign countries, A and B, and for the offences in B extradition cannot be granted, either because they are not covered by the Act or because they are of a political character, there should be power to surrender him to A with no stipulation against his surrender to B? If A must be debarred from trying him for any offence for which extradition cannot be granted, does it not follow that A should also be debarred from surrendering him to B for trial? It seems to the Secretary of State that this is the most natural construction of the words in section 3 (2) of the Act, "detained or tried in that foreign State for any offence committed prior to his surrender," and that the insertion of the words "in the other country" after "committed" is a gloss that does not afford the "arrangement" mentioned in section 3 (2) of the Act. A man who is to be extradited from A to B is not tried in A, but must certainly be detained there.

If re-extradition to a third Power is not permissible, the Secretary of State does not anticipate that any great difficulties would arise. The prisoner could be restored to the United Kingdom and a provisional warrant for his arrest obtained at the instance of the third Power, which would then take the usual steps for procuring his extradition in accordance with the treaty subsisting between the United Kingdom and that third Power.

Though, therefore, the present Belgian Treaty does not appear to give His Majesty's Government any right of protesting against the surrender of Kuhliger by Belgium to Germany, English law seems to require that Kuhliger should not have been extradited to Belgium unless the Anglo-Belgian Treaty precluded the possibility of his re-extradition to another Power without his first having been restored or having been given an opportunity of returning to this country. In fact, it would appear to be possible for any person successfully to resist extradition from the United Kingdom to Belgium upon the ground that the treaty does not afford the arrangement prescribed by section 3 (2) of the Act, and there is no provision made by Belgian law such as is mentioned in that section.

Article 6 of the Anglo-Belgian Treaty is, moreover, faulty in only providing that the surrendered person shall not be "triable or tried." Under the Act he ought not to be "detained." Under the treaty it would appear to be open to the Belgian authorities to keep a man in prison on a charge other than that for which he had been surrendered for a long period pending trial, or to punish him for any offence of which he had been convicted prior to his surrender. This is clearly not the intention of the Act.

The Secretary of State thinks that it is reasonable, even if it be not by law obligatory, to provide against a fugitive who has been extradited to a foreign country being sent afterwards to a third country for trial on a charge that may be of a political character, and if extradition treaties permit re-extradition for offences that are not political, what effective protest can be made against re-extradition for political offences?

Attention may be called to section 4 of "The Extradition Act, 1870," which enacts:—

"An Order in Council for applying this Act in the case of any foreign State shall not be made unless the arrangement . . . is in conformity with the provisions of this Act, and in particular with the restrictions on the surrender of fugitive criminals contained in this Act."

There are nine other treaties containing an article similar in terms to article 6 of the Belgian Treaty, and there might be considerable difficulty in obtaining a revision of all of them.

The Law Officers are requested to advise:—

1. Whether arrangements made with foreign countries in pursuance of section 3, subsection (2) of the Extradition Act of 1870 should prohibit the re-extradition to a third Power of a person extradited from the United Kingdom without his having had an opportunity of returning to His Majesty's dominions.
2. Does article 6 of the Anglo-Belgian Treaty prohibit such re-extradition?
3. Does article 7 of the Anglo-German Treaty prohibit such re-extradition?

Extradition Act, 1870.

Extradition Treaty with Belgium, article 6. (October 29, 1901.)

Extradition Treaty with Germany, article 7. (May 14, 1872.)

Whether these articles give proper effect to the requirements of the Act.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

We answer the questions put to us as follows:—

1. Arrangements made with foreign countries, in pursuance of section 3, subsection (2) of "The Extradition Act, 1870," should prohibit the re-extradition to a third Power of a person extradited from the United Kingdom without his having had an opportunity of returning to His Majesty's dominions.

The Extradition Act, except as regards the extradition crime, contemplates only two methods of dealing with a person extradited, viz., his restoration to His Majesty's dominions or his release to give him an opportunity of returning there. Re-extradition, moreover, must involve "detention" in the foreign country for the purpose of re-extradition, and detention, except for the extradition crime, is forbidden by the arrangement contemplated by the Act.

2. Article 6 of the Anglo-Belgian Treaty, by confining the offences for which the person extradited is not to be triable or tried to offences committed in the other country, leaves it open for the other country to detain or try him, and consequently to re-extradite him for offences committed elsewhere without infringing the treaty. It is, therefore, not such an arrangement as is contemplated by the Extradition Act of 1870.

3. In the case of the German Treaty, the answer to the question depends upon the meaning given to the words "kept in prison" in article 7. We think that these words need not be read in the narrow sense, that is, as applying only to confinement in gaol, but should be read in the wider sense, as the word imprisonment is used in connection with the action for false imprisonment known to our courts, that is, as expressing any forcible detention or restraint upon personal liberty, a view which is, we think, in accordance with the German text. The treaty does therefore prohibit re-extradition, and is consequently in accordance with the Extradition Act of 1870. The request for extradition by a third country, if considered, would involve the imprisonment or detention of the person to be extradited, and that would be contrary to the provisions of the treaty.

[File No. 1218/10.]

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 8, 1910.

"The China and Corea (Amendment) Order in Council, 1910."

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you herewith the draft of an Order in Council, to be entitled "The China and Corea (Amendment) Order in Council, 1910," dealing with the disposal of persons who have been imprisoned at Hong Kong, after sentence at Shanghai (Articles 2 and 3), and with the jurisdiction over the municipal police at Shanghai of the Captain Superintendent of that force (Articles 4 and 5).

With regard to Articles 2 and 3, I am to explain that under Section 7 of "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," and Article 66 of the China and Corea Order in Council of 1904, a person sentenced to hard labour by a Consular Court in China may be sent to serve his sentence in Hong Kong, and in practice all persons sentenced by His Majesty's Supreme Court at Shanghai to hard labour for a term of nine months or more imprisonment are so sent to Hong Kong. On the scale of punishment which prevails at Shanghai all persons receiving such sentences are deemed to have been convicted of serious crimes, and it is felt to be very undesirable that such persons, in the event of their not being natives of Shanghai, should be at liberty to return to that port at the termination of their sentence. The same considerations apply to the remaining Treaty ports.

With a view to obviating these inconveniences of the present system, Articles 2 and 3 of the draft Order have been prepared, after consultation with the Secretary of State for the Colonies. Under these Articles the Courts in China are empowered, when sentencing a prisoner to a term of imprisonment of not less than six months, to order, as part of the sentence, that such prisoner be deported. The deportation will then be carried out by the Governor of Hong Kong, if empowered by legislation at Hong Kong to do so. If the Governor is not so empowered, the prisoner will be returned to Shanghai, and the deportation will be effected thence.

Articles 4 and 5 of the draft Order have been inserted for the purpose of further regulating the disciplinary powers conferred upon the officer in command of the Shanghai Municipal Police Force, and include certain modifications in "The China and Corea (Amendment) Order in Council, 1909," which experience has shown to be desirable. Article 5 of the draft Order also provides for sentences of detention, as differentiated from imprisonment in "The Army Act, 1907," Schedule 3. The object of this provision is that the self-respect of the men punished, who remain in the police force, may be preserved.

I am to request that you will take the draft Order into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

I have, &c.

W. LANGLEY.

Report.

The draft Order as initialled by us may, in our opinion, properly be submitted for the approval of His Majesty in Council.

(3.) For the purposes of this article, "detention" and "detention barrack" shall have the same meaning as in the Army Act.

And the Right Honourable Sir Edward Grey, Baronet, one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, is to give the necessary directions hereinafter.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 12, 1910.

Savarkar escaped from British steamer:

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to enclose, for your consideration, the papers noted in the accompanying list relating to a demand made by the French Government for the surrender to them of an Indian subject of the name of Savarkar.

The facts of the case are as follows: A warrant for the arrest of Savarkar was issued by a duly constituted Court in British India. Upon this warrant Savarkar was arrested in England, and ordered to be removed to India under "The Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881." He was accordingly placed on board the P. and O. Company's steam-ship "Morea" in the custody of two Indian policemen.

The crimes of which Savarkar is accused included the abetment of the murder of Mr. Jackson, and were the following:—

1. Waging and abetting the waging of war against the King;
2. Conspiring to wage war against the King;
3. Collecting arms with intent to wage war against the King;
4. Sedition;
5. Abetment of murder;

and it may be mentioned that Savarkar is believed to be a prominent member of the organisation which is responsible to a large extent for the unrest which is at present prevailing in India.

In order to avoid any possibility of an attempt on the part of Indian extremists to rescue Savarkar or to provoke demonstrations during the period the "Morea" was at Marseilles, the Chief Commissioner of Police in London warned the French police of the day when the "Morea" would probably reach Marseilles and of the presence of Savarkar on board, and asked that all due precautions might be taken. Copies of this letter and of the French reply are enclosed (Papers (A) and (B)).

While the "Morea" was at Marseilles Savarkar succeeded in escaping by jumping through a port-hole and swimming ashore. He was rearrested by a French gendarme and brought back on board the "Morea."

The actual facts of this incident are in all probability correctly given in M. Cambon's third note, which states them as follows:—

"Or, il est aujourd'hui avéré qu'au moment de l'évasion de Savarkar, les agents anglais de la 'Morea' ont appelé par leurs cris l'attention des gendarmes français sur cette évasion, que trois de ces agents ont débarqué du paquebot britannique, qu'ils ont pris part à l'arrestation du fugitif, et qu'ils l'ont eux-mêmes ramené de force à bord de la 'Morea' de concert avec le Brigadier de Gendarmerie Pesquié.

"Voici ce que ce dernier a déclaré au Commissaire spécial de Police de Marseilles, M. A. Borelli, chargé de procéder à une enquête sur cette affaire:

"Le vendredi, 8 juillet courant, j'étais de service au paquebot "Morea," de la Compagnie Peninsular, lorsque, vers 7 heures du matin, je vis un homme presque nu sortir par un hublot de ce vapeur, se jeter à la mer et gagner le quai à la nage. Au même instant, des personnes du bord se sont précipitées, en criant et en gesticulant, sur la passerelle conduisant à terre pour se mettre à la poursuite de cet homme. Ne connaissant pas la langue anglaise, je n'ai pas saisi exactement quels cris poussaient ces personnes, mais il ne pouvait y avoir aucun doute pour moi: ces personnes étaient à la poursuite de l'homme qui se sauvait; leurs gestes signifiaient: "Arrêtez-le!"

"D'autre part, les nombreuses personnes se trouvant sur le quai, dans les parages du navire, ouvriers des quais, pisteurs, marchands, &c., dont l'attention put être attirée par les cris et les gestes des personnes qui descendaient précipitamment du navire, se mirent à crier: "Arrêtez-le! Arrêtez-le!"

"Je m'élançais aussitôt à la poursuite du fugitif et le rejoignis, après un parcours de 500 mètres environ, à l'extrémité du bassin du radoub; lorsque je mis la main sur lui, il me posa à deux reprises la question suivante: "Vous policeman français?" Je répondis, Oui. Je le pris par un bras pour le ramener vers le navire et il me suivit docilement.

"J'avais fait environ 10 mètres, lorsque trois des personnes qui étaient descendues précipitamment du navire, arrivèrent en courant, saisirent l'individu par le bras droit, alors que je le tenais par le bras gauche, et nous arrivâmes ainsi à bord du navire sans échanger aucune parole."

Inspector Parker's report and a more recent telegram from India (Papers (C) and (D)) are annexed, but the latter is stated by Viscount Morley's advisers to bear some trace of a desire on the part of the Indian policemen to magnify their own share in the recovery of Savarkar.

Taking the facts as stated by M. Daeschner, the complaints by the French Government against the conduct of the Indian policemen appear to be based on two grounds—the pursuit of Savarkar on shore, and the taking hold of his arm when he had been arrested by the gendarme. Both actions are consistent with a mere desire to assist the French police in the discharge of their duty; there is nothing to show that they intended to oust the French police from the discharge of their functions and take such duties upon themselves; it does not appear that when the Indian policemen took hold of Savarkar's arm they either intended or desired to substitute themselves for the gendarme as custodians of Savarkar; the latter had been arrested by the gendarme, and remained in his custody until he was on board the "Morea."

The "Morea" in due course sailed from Marseilles on the 9th July with Savarkar on board. The fact, however, that Savarkar had escaped and had reached French soil became known to the French newspapers, and the question was taken up by the leader of the Socialist group in the French Chamber. The French Minister for Foreign Affairs accordingly spoke to the British Ambassador on the 18th July on the subject, and the French Ambassador in London handed a note to Sir E. Grey on the same day, asking that, pending a decision of the questions raised by the incident, no proceedings should be taken against Savarkar (Papers (E) and (F)). At the time when Sir E. Grey received this note Savarkar was still on the high seas, as the "Morea" did not reach Bombay till the 22nd July;* but it may be remarked that, in this note, the Ambassador did not ask for the rendition of Savarkar, a request which was only made when the man was within the jurisdiction of the Indian Courts, i.e., in the note of the 25th July.

On the 25th July another note from the French Embassy reached Sir E. Grey demanding that, as Savarkar had reached French territory and had been handed over irregularly by the French policeman without any legal or other process for his extradition or expulsion having been taken, he should be reconducted to French territory (Paper (G)).

On the 3rd August a third note (Paper (H)) was received, giving a slightly different account of the facts of the incident at Marseilles from those previously set out in M. Cambon's notes, and alleging that the acts of the Indian policemen constitute a violation of French territory requiring an apology as well as the surrender of Savarkar. It is from this note that the facts, as stated in an earlier paragraph of this reference, have been taken.

After the arrival of Savarkar in India he passed into the custody of the Indian authorities, and the proceedings against him in the Court at Nasik have commenced. The Court, however, has granted a short adjournment of his trial, which will admit of the questions of international law that have arisen being discussed between the Governments concerned.

The only answer which has, up till now, been returned to M. Cambon is a note stating that the question is engaging the serious attention of His Majesty's Government, and that Savarkar is now at Nasik, within the jurisdiction of the British Indian Courts of Justice, as, before deciding what further answer to return, Sir E. Grey is anxious to receive your opinion upon the legal questions involved.

Sir E. Grey is advised that there can be no doubt but that, as Savarkar had reached French soil, the French policeman acted wrongly in handing him back to the custody of the Indian police officers without the machinery for the extradition of criminals having been set in motion, but, assuming that this action was a mistake on the part of the French policeman, it by no means follows that an obligation to set the mistake right falls on the British authorities, as no blame can attach to the Indian policemen for keeping Savarkar in their custody after he had been rearrested and handed over to them by the French gendarme.

Instances are not wanting of persons accused of crimes being handed over to the authorities of one country by the mistake of an official of another country.

The case most nearly in point appears to be that of a Frenchman named Lamirande, who fled to Canada after having committed a crime in France. Proceedings were initiated for his extradition, and he was arrested; but while under arrest in Canada, the case was brought before the law courts upon an application for a habeas corpus, as he claimed to be entitled to be released upon various grounds. Before his application had been finally dealt with application was made to the Governor-General, who, in ignorance that any legal proceedings were pending, signed an instrument under which the sheriff issued an order, and the accused was handed over to the French police.

Details of this case will be found in the accompanying printed Foreign Office Paper No. 1491 (Paper (I)) and the accompanying Reports of the Law Officers. A copy of the Judgment of the Canadian Court delivered subsequently to the removal of the accused in French custody will be found in the Appendix to "Clarke upon Extradition," 4th edition, page cccxcv.

* Since this reference was drafted, it has been ascertained that the "Morea" reached Aden on July 17, where mails and passengers for Bombay were transferred to the steam-ship "Salsette," which arrived at Bombay on July 22.—W. M.

The case is one of an accused person handed over by the mistake of an official, and received into the custody of the officials of another country to whom no blame attached. The only difference between that case and the case of Savarkar is, that in the former an extradition order was issued when it ought not to have been, and in the latter no such order was issued at all.

Her Majesty's Government claimed the re-surrender of Lamirande to them not as a matter of right, but of comity, but the French Government declined to accede to the request. The discussion ultimately terminated by the desire of Lamirande. The Law Officers advised that Her Majesty's Government were not entitled to claim the surrender of Lamirande as a matter of right, and your particular attention is drawn to the fifth paragraph of their Report of the 15th November, 1866, giving their opinion as to what would happen in a case the converse of that of Lamirande, i.e., in the exact circumstances of this case.

Another case is that of the murderers of Captain Keyes in 1901. These men were French deserters who crossed from French territory into Nigeria, and there murdered Captain Keyes; they then escaped back into French territory, where they were apprehended. They were subsequently surrendered by a French official to the British authorities without any request for their extradition having been made. They were tried and condemned by the British Courts, but before their execution the French Government demanded their surrender. The men were ultimately handed over for that purpose to the French authorities after an undertaking had been obtained that they should be put on trial for the murder before the French Courts. No application could have been made by the Nigerian officials for their extradition, as the men were of French nationality. The facts are fully set out in the Minute by Sir E. Davidson, annexed to the Report of the Law Officers, dated the 29th November, 1901 (Paper (J)). The Law Officers held that the question of the surrender of the men to the French Government was not a question of law, but that as a matter of policy it would be proper to comply with the request of the French Government, as the men had been handed over to the British authorities under a misapprehension. Sir E. Grey infers from this opinion that the surrender of the murderers of Captain Keyes could not have been demanded by the French Government as a matter of right.

There are also certain cases in which the question has arisen whether the Court before which a man is tried can take cognizance of a contention by him that he was brought within the jurisdiction of the Court by improper means, and ought on that ground not to be tried. This point was raised in "ex parte Scott" (9 Barnwell and Cresswell 446 (1829)), where it was held that if a person charged with a crime is found within the jurisdiction, the Court has nothing to do with the circumstances under which he came there.

Another case is that of J. H. Blair, whose removal from the United States of America to this country was obtained in 1876, not by extradition proceedings, but by a grossly improper misapplication of the machinery existing in the United States of America for the removal of accused persons from one place to another. Blair had become bankrupt and fled to the United States of America after committing an offence which was not within the Extradition Treaty; but his creditors sent a detective after him, who obtained a warrant in pretended good faith from the Governor of Nebraska to remove him to Chicago on a charge of perjury in connection with the declaration of his baggage. He was then surreptitiously taken to New York, placed on board a British ship, brought to England and tried and condemned at the Assizes. The Court held that it could not go into the question of international law as to the regularity of his removal to this country, and he was sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment. Representations were made by the United States' Government, and the matter was referred to the Law Officers (Paper (K)).

It should be observed that the present case differs materially from that of Blair, in that Savarkar was put off French soil by a French official acting in the reasonable discharge of his duty, and under the orders of his superior officers, whereas Blair was kidnapped on American soil by the ruse of a British detective, acting on behalf of a private prosecutor in England.

Various cases are also cited in Sir E. Clarke's book upon extradition, which show that, in the opinion of the French authorities, the Courts are not to consider the circumstances under which the power of surrender has been exercised so as to bring within their jurisdiction a man who is accused of an offence; the mere fact that the man has been surrendered invests the Court with the power to take cognizance of the case in respect of which he has been surrendered. Reference may be made to the cases of Renneçon, Clarke (4th edition), page 220, and Cyvoct, page 225.

These latter cases appear to establish the proposition that, as Savarkar is now within the jurisdiction of the Court at Nasik accused of an offence of which that Court can take cognizance, the Court must deal with the case, and cannot entertain any contentions raised by Savarkar as to the regularity of his rearrest and redelivery to the custody of the Indian policemen at Marseilles; that matter must be dealt with between the two Governments.

Sir E. Grey is informed that, under the laws in force in India, no power is given to the Executive Government to interfere with or to defer the trial of a person who is in the custody of a Court accused of an offence; the Court has, of course, power to adjourn the trial of a case, but the Government has no means of compelling the Court to do so.

Unless you consider that the fact that, at the moment when the French Government put forward their demand, Savarkar was still upon the high seas renders these cases inapplicable, Sir Edward Grey is inclined to think that these latter cases afford an adequate answer to the demand made in the first note from the French Ambassador, that no steps should be taken to bring Savarkar to justice until the questions raised by his surrender had been settled.

I am to ask you to take the papers into your consideration, and favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion—

1. Whether, as a matter of strict law, and apart from all questions of policy, His Majesty's Government are bound, because of the escape of Savarkar to French soil, and his restoration by a French gendarme to British custody, to restore Savarkar to French territory.

If your answer to the above question is in the negative, there will remain for consideration the question of policy, whether it would be desirable to undertake to surrender Savarkar after the conclusion of his trial. Viscount Morley attaches great importance to the trial of Savarkar being allowed to pursue its course, as there are a considerable number of other prisoners connected with the same organisation awaiting trial, and the admissibility of important evidence may depend upon the inclusion of Savarkar in the common charge.

If your answer to question (1) is in the affirmative, Sir E. Grey would be glad if you would also state (2) whether, in your opinion, he would be justified in saying that, as Savarkar is in the custody of the Court and the Executive Government have no power to interfere, it is impossible to take any steps to comply with the French request before the conclusion of the trial, but that, in the event of his conviction, his surrender shall be made so soon as the trial is concluded.

I am to request that, in view of the urgency of returning an answer to the French notes, you will favour Sir E. Grey with your Report with as little delay as possible.

Sir E. Grey will also be glad of any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer upon the papers now submitted to you.

I have, &c.

F. A. CAMPBELL.

P.S.—I am further to request that, as the Solicitor-General is understood to be abroad, the case may be dealt with by the Attorney-General alone.

A further note received from the French Embassy, dated the 9th August, is also enclosed (Paper (M)).

Opinion of Attorney-General.

His Majesty's Government are not bound to restore Savarkar to French territory. The following circumstances are disclosed in the accompanying papers:—

1. That before Savarkar was taken by the British authorities into French territory, the assent of the French Government was duly obtained to his being kept in custody there by those authorities;

2. That an agreement was thereupon arrived at between Great Britain and France that the French authorities should assist the British authorities to prevent the escape of Savarkar from British custody;

3. That in the circumstances, this agreement amounted to a stipulation that Savarkar should not be entitled to any rights of asylum on French soil; and

4. That in giving him up the French police properly acted in accordance with the instructions given to them under the above agreement.

So far as Great Britain is concerned this agreement was within the competence of the French Government, and was valid and binding as between the two States. If it should happen to conflict with the French law of extradition (as to which I have no information) that is a matter which concerns the French authorities alone, and does not disentitle the Government of Great Britain from retaining any advantage it may have already acquired in good faith under such agreement. I do not think, however, that the agreement is likely to be in conflict with the substance or spirit of any French extradition law.

It is, perhaps, desirable that I should state somewhat fully the grounds upon which I have arrived at the above conclusions.

On the 29th June, 1910, Sir Edward Henry, acting for the British police, gave notice that the "Morea" would call at Marseilles with Savarkar on the 7th or 8th July. He at the same time indicated that there might be some demonstration or attempted interference with the escort at Marseilles, and asked the French police to take such steps as they might consider necessary to ensure the safety (i.e., the security or custody) of the prisoner while at Marseilles. M. Hennion replied by letter, dated the 9th July, 1910, saying that he had given the necessary instructions ("les instructions nécessaires en vue d'éviter tout incident à l'occasion du passage à Marseilles du nommé Savarkar embarqué à bord du vapeur 'Morea'").

In the meantime M. Hennion had communicated with the Préfet des Bouches du Rhône, and had given him instructions to the effect that the escape of the prisoner should be prevented. The local police at the same time received orders not to allow any Hindu to go on board the "Morea" without a ticket (see memorandum from the French Embassy of the 18th July, 1910). The "Morea" arrived at Marseilles on the 7th July, 1910, and on its arrival the commissaire spécial of the port called and informed those in charge of the "Morea" that he had received instructions to render every possible assistance. He further introduced to them the police officers on the quay, and promised to render all the assistance that they (the British authorities) might require (see report of Inspector Parker of the 8th July, 1910).

At this time M. Hennion's letter of the 9th July had not been received. It was apparently sent off after the prisoner's escape and without information of that circumstance, but the understanding between the two sets of police authorities, respectively representing Great Britain and France, was obviously complete on the 7th July, and Savarkar's escape did not take place until the next day.

It follows, therefore, that when that escape took place Savarkar was already in French territory, and by the agreement of the two Governments he was being held in custody there under their joint co-operation and control, the right of the British authorities being to keep him on board the ship, and the duty of the French authorities being to prevent him from reaching the land, or, if by any mischance he should reach the land, then the duty of the French authorities was to hand him back to the British authorities in whose custody it was agreed that he should remain.

That this was the true intent and purport of the agreement is shown by the passage I have above cited from M. Cambon's memorandum of the 18th July, 1910. Every sovereign State possesses the right to refuse hospitality to an alien, or to prescribe, according to its own uncontrolled discretion, the terms on which any alien shall be allowed to enter its territory. Those terms, in the case of Savarkar, were that he should remain in the custody of his own Government while within the territorial waters of France or the Harbour of Marseilles. This consideration disposes of the ground on which M. Cambon bases his demand for the rendition of the prisoner, namely, that he had acquired a right of residence and asylum on French soil. So far from that being the fact, he was only taken by Great Britain through French territory on the express stipulation by France that he should not be allowed to acquire any such right.

The agreement thus constituted was duly acted on by the French authorities. As soon as Savarkar reached the land a French gendarme started in pursuit. The policemen from the "Morea" also started in pursuit, but appeared to have been behind the Frenchman, who was the first to arrive at the prisoner and arrest him. (See M. Cambon's memorandum of the 18th July, "il fut rattrapé par un brigadier de gendarmerie, qui le ramena à bord de la 'Morea.'") The British police came up with the prisoner when he was already in the custody of Brigadier Pesquié, and no doubt walked with him, and assisted to hold him, on his way back to the ship. This does not alter the fact that Savarkar had already surrendered himself to the French policeman and was then in his custody. Brigadier Pesquié had walked back towards the ship about 10 metres before the British police came up. He accompanied him to the ship and duly surrendered him. It may perhaps be contended that the action of the British police in pursuing their prisoner on land was irregular, but in the events that happened it was unimportant, and did not make any difference to the recapture or delivery up of the prisoner. Their action undoubtedly introduces an element of difficulty, but, on a consideration of all the circumstances, I do not think it can fairly be said that it constituted any violation of French territory or sovereignty. At the same time, it must be admitted that the agreement between the police of the two countries did not, in express terms, provide for the exercise by the British police of any authority on land.

It was no doubt expected that so far as the land was concerned the French police would be sufficient (as in fact they were) for all the purposes of the agreement. The action of the British police was, therefore, unnecessary and was not expressly authorized, but it was obviously intended to be in aid of the French police in the maintenance of a joint custody.

It was certainly not an act which was then or could be now treated by the French authorities as one relieving them of their obligations under the agreement, or as depriving the British authorities of its advantages. There is no rule of international law which prevents a foreigner in a foreign country from assisting a police officer in the performance of a lawful act of seizure. The act which replaced Savarkar on board the "Morea" was not an act of which the French Government can rightfully complain, for it was an act which emanated from themselves by virtue of the instructions given to their gendarme by their authority.

It is to be observed that no point is made by the French authorities on the action of the British police. M. Cambon's objection (see his formal demand of the 23rd July, 1910) is, that the prisoner was delivered up to the British authorities by a subordinate agent who was acting irregularly in depriving Savarkar of his supposed right to remain on French soil.

In my view, for the reasons above stated, Savarkar had no such right; the French authorities were bound to prevent him from acquiring any such right, and the action of their policeman was in accordance with his instructions and the terms of the agreement between the two countries.

The case, therefore, is not of a criminal who has been handed over in violation of the conditions of an extradition treaty, but of an alien who has been excluded from French soil which he had no right to enter. Extradition questions only arise when a fugitive criminal has been admitted into foreign territory, but in this case Savarkar never was admitted into French territory except on the terms that he should remain a prisoner on the "Morea."

2. I do not think Sir Edward Grey would be justified in promising that Savarkar should be surrendered so soon as his trial is concluded, nor do I think that the executive Government have power under the circumstances to insist upon the trial being delayed.

Annex.

IN this connection attention may be called to the case of J. H. Blair, who was removed from the United States to this country without Treaty obligation, though not with the consent of the United States Government. The facts are as follows:—

Blair, a Sheffield tradesman, having failed, packed up some of his most valuable effects and fled to the United States of America. The Extradition Treaty not including the offence of which he had been guilty, the creditors sent a detective after him to contrive his capture. Under a warrant obtained in pretended good faith from the Governor of Nebraska to remove him from Lincoln City, in the State of Nebraska, to Chicago, in the State of Illinois, on a charge of perjury in connection with his declaration of baggage, he was surreptitiously taken to New York and placed, handcuffed, on board a British ship, landed at Queenstown, handed over to an arresting officer, and committed for trial by the stipendiary Magistrate at Liverpool. The case was heard before Mr. Justice Mellor, who, notwithstanding the prisoner's protest of having been irregularly taken in America and brought to England without proper warrant, refused to go into any question of international law, and tried him in the usual way, sentencing him to eighteen months' imprisonment. On the representations of the United States Government that there had been a breach of international comity, the opinion of the Law Officers was taken.

In reporting on the legal aspect of the question they were of the opinion that no wrong had been done by His Majesty's Government; that they saw no reason for setting Blair at liberty; that supposing he were set at liberty, His Majesty's Government had no power to restore him to the jurisdiction from which he was taken; that the act of the abductors (some of whom were United States citizens) was one for which His Majesty's Government could not properly indemnify him; that he could bring his action for assault, &c., and so recover damages; and that the parties who brought him over should be indicted. At the same time, they thought that a gross outrage had been committed, and that, as a matter of policy, Blair should be pardoned, and that, if the pardon were on condition that he returned to the United States of America, the object of the Government might possibly be attained.

Sir Thomas Henry thought that the English Government ought not to give effect to a sentence which was obtained by fraud, and that they could not resist the application to discharge Blair from custody.

It was finally arranged that Blair should be pardoned on condition that he sailed to the United States of America and did not return to this country during the term of his sentence. His expenses were paid to Chicago.

[September 10, 1910.]

Memorandum by the Lord Chancellor as to Savarkar's Case.

I ENTERTAIN no doubt that the claim of the French Government for the restoration of Savarkar to French territory is, under international law and usage, wholly inadmissible, considerations of pure policy apart.

To begin with, no claim can be sustained on the footing of a supposed right of asylum residing in Savarkar himself. He had no such right, as the Attorney-General points out, and, if he had, the French Government are not the people to assert it, for he is not a French subject. They can only claim on the footing of a wrong done to France. This is not a case of a Government demanding the restoration of their own national, whom they are bound to protect, or of some one who has committed a crime in their territory, whom they are entitled to punish. It is a claim to have restored to them a British subject charged with committing a crime in British territory, and at this moment within British jurisdiction, by reason of the action of the French police, in accordance with arrangements made between the police of the two countries. Such a claim can be supported only on the ground of comity, which means that, as good neighbours, we ought to give the man back, though we are not bound to do so. If there has really been an outrage of French sovereignty, it may well be that we ought to do so. Surely not otherwise.

I will not restate the precedents of Lamirande, Blair, and Keyes. In no one of them did the Law Officers of the Crown assert or admit any right to have the prisoner resurrendered. In each case the British Government treated it as a matter of comity or of policy, which is very much the same thing. And in the Lamirande case, when the French Government were the parties asked to resurrender, they would not do it, even as a matter of comity, though they had obtained their prisoner by an error on the part of the British Governor, who was manifestly deceived. In the Blair case there had been a gross fraud and outrage on the American Government. In the Keyes' case the murderers, who were resurrendered to France, were French subjects, and, as extradition could not have been obtained, the form of their trial was, at least arguably, French. Yet in both these cases the resurrender was only on the ground of policy, wise or unwise.

It is not because a State has delivered up a prisoner by error, if there has been error, that resurrender has taken place, but because the State which surrenders him or its subjects have affronted the rights and dignity of another State in such a way as to owe a signal moral reparation, as in Blair's case, or because it is thought politic to do so, as in Keyes' case.

Next comes the question: Has there been in the case of Savarkar any such conduct toward the French Government as should lead us, in point of comity, to release a man who is alleged to be a dangerous criminal of the worst type actually concerned in the assassination of a British official? There must, in matters of comity, be some proportion between the conduct complained of and the reparation or atonement to be made in respect of it, if any is to be made at all.

From this point of view the opinion of the Attorney-General, dated the 19th August, 1910, appears to me quite unanswerable. It does not matter whether what passed amounted to an agreement or not, though it was, in fact, an explicit promise by the French police that the prisoner to be sent via Marseilles should be prevented from escaping, and was so understood by the English police. In private litigation it would be absurd for principals to deny responsibility for the conduct of their agents acting within their ostensible authority, on which other persons reasonably relied. That, however, is not the main significance of what passed. Its main significance lies in this: that it excludes absolutely the idea of any disrespect or deception or outrage toward France, such as might furnish material for a claim to resurrender on the ground of comity.

It must be common for ships carrying prisoners for trial to put in at foreign ports. In law a foreign port, intra fauces portus, is as much a part of the foreign country as is its capital city. It cannot surely be said that if a German vessel calls at Southampton or a French vessel at Aden, carrying a prisoner for trial, a wrong has been committed against the British Government, who could on that account require his restoration to British soil. Even if a technical wrong had been committed, no one would think that restoration was an appropriate atonement. In fact this kind of thing is allowed by all States because it is convenient to all. I do not, however, find that the French Government asks for Savarkar's resurrender on the ground that he was unlawfully detained on the "Morea" while in the port of Marseilles.

It must be, then, on the ground of the escape for a few minutes and the recapture, and that this was a violation of French sovereignty in a degree quite different from the venial detention within the port of Marseilles on board ship. This recapture was effected by a French gendarme. If he was acting against his duty, he may justly be reprehended by his employers. In fact he was acting upon instructions from his superiors to help in preventing this man's escape. In any case the error, if error there was, of the French gendarme and his superiors, cannot be tortured into a disrespect by the British Government or by British subjects.

In regard to the co-operation of the two British police agents, what they did was to make a clamour so as to procure the arrest, and then to take hold of the prisoner on the one side, while the French gendarme who had arrested him held him on the other. They did not usurp the right of arrest or oppose or supplant the French gendarme, but simply assisted him. It is one thing to say that to assist the French police was technically a violation of French sovereignty. If so it was a trifle, without intended offence, of which no Government can make a real grievance. It is quite a different thing to say that such an incident carries with it a duty to restore Savarkar. At most, it involves a disavowal and expression of regret. This might be given if it is desired to soothe any feeling of irritation, and would suffice for any reasonable person. To claim that in this respect anything had been done involving so serious an interference with the course of justice as the release of this man seems to me quite extravagant.

The truth evidently is that, so far from there being any outrage on the French Government, everything was done in complete good faith and (except for the assistance of the British police officers, which had no effect on the result) exactly as had been arranged by the police of both countries should be done if the man tried to escape. It seems to me that the British Government would have cause to complain if, after they had been led to send Savarkar by a ship calling at Marseilles on the assurance of support from the French police, that assurance was afterwards repudiated.

It appears from the French communications that they regard as an ingredient in this case the supposed fact that Savarkar's crime was "political." In my opinion the assassination of Mr. Jackson was not a "political" crime. How it may be regarded in France I do not, of course, know. Nor do I see how its being a "political" crime, if it were so, makes any difference. It would be an important fact in any proceedings for extradition. There are none here, and the imaginary affront to France is not either greater or less by reason of the nature of the offence with which the prisoner is charged.

I think the request of the French Government may properly be refused upon the ground that he is a British subject charged with being a party to murder in British territory, and that no disrespect was intended or showed toward French sovereignty; that Savarkar was arrested and handed over by the French police acting under directions from head-quarters, and that if His Majesty's Government had not been assured beforehand of the co-operation of the French police at Marseilles he would not have been sent by a vessel touching at that port.

The true explanation of what happened, and the justification of a refusal to resurrender Savarkar, is the arrangement made between our police and the French. This is vital to show that there has been no affront against French sovereignty and no duty to resurrender. No doubt the disclosure may be politically inconvenient to the present French Ministry. Of that I am not able to judge. But I am sure it is only fair to the British Government that it should be known.

Note by Mr. Maycock.

I HAVE endeavoured in this draft to embody the salient points of the Lord Chancellor's Memorandum, but I don't think we can say "that if His Majesty's Government had not been assured beforehand of the co-operation of the French police at Marseilles he would not have been sent by a vessel touching at that port."

Sir E. Henry wrote to M. Hennion on the 29th June.

The "Morea" sailed from Gravesend on the 1st July.

M. Hennion's reply was dated the 9th July, the day after the escape.

Savarkar's passage must have been taken even before Sir E. Henry wrote to M. Hennion at all.

Note by the Lord Chancellor respecting the Savarkar Case.

IN regard to the proposed draft of despatch to French Government:—

1. It would of course be wrong to say that Savarkar would not have been sent by a vessel touching at a French port if His Majesty's Government had not been assured beforehand of the co-operation of French police—unless the statement is true. I assumed it to be true because of what Sir E. Grey says in his Minute on No. 27 (at p. 30) of the printed documents sent me.

If it is not strictly accurate, would it not be accurate to say that His Majesty's Government would not have sent him by a vessel touching at Marseilles but for their belief that the French authorities would be instructed, as in fact they were instructed, "à l'effet d'empêcher l'évasion du prisonnier"? (See M. Cambon's letter of the 18th July, No. 4 in the printed documents.) Is it not desirable to say this?

2. Might it not be well to state a little more of what passed at Marseilles? The commissaire when on board the "Morea" told the officer of gendarmes to give the English police "any assistance he might require" in regard to the Indian prisoner. (Enclosure 3 of No. 28 of printed documents.)

3. Would it not be well to add that in Lamirande's case the British Government only asked his restoration on the ground of comity, not of right? (See Mr. Hurst's Minute of the 29th July, No. 16, on p. 11 of printed documents.)

I have no other comments to offer.

[Additions made to draft in accordance with above.—W. M.]

Foreign Office, September 23, 1910.

Sir Edward Grey to M. Daeschner.*

Sir,

Foreign Office, September 24, 1910.

WITH reference to the concluding paragraph of my note of the 1st instant, I have now the honour to state that His Majesty's Government have further and fully considered the request of the French Government, conveyed in M. Cambon's note of the 23rd July last, that the fugitive criminal Damodar Savarkar, who escaped from the steam-ship "Morea" at Marseilles on the 8th July last, should be restored to French territory ("soit reconduit sur le territoire Français").

It may be convenient that I should briefly recapitulate the facts in connection with this case, which happily are not in dispute.

On the 29th June last Sir E. Henry, the Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, addressed a letter to M. Hennion, the Director of the Sûreté Générale in Paris, advising him that Savarkar was being sent to India to take his trial for abetment of murder, and asking, as there were some Indian Extremists who might make a demonstration at Marseilles or interfere with the escort, that M. Hennion would be so good as to take such steps as he considered necessary to ensure the safety of the prisoner while in that port.

M. Hennion replied, in a note dated the 9th July, to the effect that he had issued the necessary instructions to prevent any incident occurring at Marseilles.

The "Morea" arrived at Marseilles with Savarkar on board about noon on the 7th July, and directly afterwards the Commissaire Spécial of the port came on board, showed an English police officer, Mr. Parker, a letter (presumably that from Sir E. Henry to M. Hennion) from Scotland Yard, saw Savarkar in the cabin, and then took Mr. Parker ashore and introduced him to the officer in charge of the police on the quay. There were four or five gendarmes in uniform. The commissaire addressing their officer said, "Let me introduce to you the English police officer who has an Indian prisoner on board. You must give him any assistance he may require and prevent any strange Indians from assembling on the quay or going on board."

Between 6 and 7 on the following morning Savarkar succeeded in getting through a porthole of the "Morea" and swam ashore, where he was arrested and conducted back to the "Morea" by a French gendarme. This officer never relaxed hold of Savarkar from the moment he arrested him till he was delivered on board the "Morea." The action of the ship's steward and two Indian constables who, on hearing of the escape of Savarkar, had landed and taken part in the pursuit seems, as a result of the fullest investigation, to have been wholly confined to assisting the French police officer to escort Savarkar back to the "Morea," and it can hardly be contended that there was anything unlawful or irregular in this proceeding. It is a common occurrence in every country for independent individuals to assist police officers, if they think they need it, in the execution of their duties. In any circumstances the action of these persons on this occasion in no way affected the final issue, and being, as it was, co-operation with a French official willingly accepted by him at the time, it cannot be regarded as derogatory to French authority either in fact or intention.

His Majesty's Government understand from the tenor of M. Cambon's note that the French Government base their claim for the restoration of Savarkar on the ground that he had acquired a right of residence and asylum on French soil. If that is the proposition advanced by the French Government, it is negatived by the action taken by the authorities at Paris and Marseilles with the specific object of precluding Savarkar from acquiring any such right. The claim cannot, moreover, be sustained on a supposed right of asylum residing in Savarkar himself, since he is not a French citizen.

In the opinion of His Majesty's Government, a claim for the restoration of Savarkar could only be based on some action on the part of the British authorities which constituted an affront to the sovereign rights of France; but the facts cited clearly establish, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, that no such affront was either offered or contemplated. I need hardly add that nothing could have been further from the mind of the British authorities concerned. A British subject charged with the grave offence of abetment to murder in British territory was simply being conveyed in a British ship to take his trial for the offence alleged against him.

There was no concealment; the fact was notified by the Chief Commissioner of Metropolitan Police to the official occupying a corresponding position in Paris, who in turn issued such directions as he thought right and proper to prevent the escape of the prisoner at Marseilles. As a result of these instructions Savarkar was in fact arrested by a French police officer, and by him replaced on the vessel from which he had escaped. Savarkar would not have been sent to India by a vessel putting in at a French port had not the British police authorities had ground for believing that the French police would be instructed, as in fact they were instructed, "à l'effet d'empêcher l'évasion du prisonnier."

Various authorities and precedents have been searched without discovering any case precisely analogous to that under discussion.

The French Government may possibly have had in mind the case of the men who killed Captain Keyes in Nigeria in 1901. On that occasion it is true that His Majesty's Government restored those men who, through inadvertence, had been handed over by a French officer to be dealt with by the authorities of the British Protectorate. It will be remembered, however, that those men were only restored to the French authorities on a distinct assurance that they would be tried for murder. It was an act of comity solely on the part of His Majesty's Government, who were, moreover, largely influenced by the fact that the men were French citizens, and by the knowledge that they would not escape justice. On that occasion, however, His Majesty's Government never admitted that they were under any obligation to restore them. The circumstances were, in short, wholly dissimilar to those of Savarkar.

A closer analogy is, however, to be found in the attitude of the French Government in the Lamirande case in 1866. A French fugitive criminal escaped to Canada, whence his surrender in extradition was demanded by the French Government. He was handed over through inadvertence to the French Consul, and shipped for France before certain legal formalities had been completed. The request of His Majesty's Government that he might be restored as an act of comity, and not of right, to British jurisdiction was not accorded by the French Government.

His Majesty's Government are therefore unable to admit that they are under any obligation to restore Savarkar to French territory, and they sincerely trust that the French Government will, upon further consideration, view the matter in the same light. Should this, however, unfortunately not be the case, His Majesty's Government would be willing, in the special circumstances of the case, and as a mark of their consideration for the wishes of the French Government in the matter, to submit to arbitration the question whether, in accordance with international law, any obligation to surrender Savarkar to French jurisdiction can be held to devolve upon them.

I am, &c.

*Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.*Draft Foreign Jurisdiction
[Admiralty] Order in Council:
submitting.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, November 23, 1909.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to submit to you herewith the accompanying draft of an order in council, entitled "The Foreign Jurisdiction (Admiralty) Order in Council, 1910."

I am to state that His Majesty's Supreme Court at Shanghai has a considerable amount of Admiralty business, and that up to the present time such work has been dealt with under the powers conferred upon the court by article 100 of "The China and Corea Order in Council, 1904," which applies certain sections of "The Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890," to the Supreme Court at Shanghai, by virtue of the power given by section 12 of that Act. It has, however, been found that this manner of applying the sections of the Act in question is not a convenient method of procedure, particularly with regard to the question of fees and rules of court, and Sir Havilland de Sausmarez, the judge of His Majesty's Supreme Court for China and Corea, has therefore prepared a draft order in council, re-enacting in the form of an order in council under "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," and in terms more directly consonant with local requirements, the applied sections, together with such other additional sections as experience had shown would be useful. This draft order applies not only to China, but to all the foreign jurisdiction courts which are under the supervision of this Office.

The draft has been carefully considered in this department, in consultation with Sir H. de Sausmarez and Judge Cator (the judge of His Majesty's Supreme Consular Court for the dominions of the Ottoman Porte), when they were in this country on leave of absence, and various amendments have been introduced.

Sir E. Grey is of opinion that the order will, in its present form, be a useful enactment, and will render the powers of the courts concerned in Admiralty matters clearer and simpler.

I am to request that you will take the draft order in council into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in council for His Majesty's approval.

Sir E. Grey would at the same time be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general nature which you may desire to offer on the papers now submitted to you.

I have, &c.

W. LANGLEY.

[File No. 8240/10.]

Report—

We have considered the draft order in council submitted to us and that, in our opinion, its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in council for His Majesty's approval, subject to the following observations:—

It appears from the letter of reference that it was intended to re-enact in the proposed order in council those sections of "The Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890," which are applied by the existing order in council in each case together with certain additions. We observe that several provisions of the applied sections have been omitted, and we are not informed of the reasons which led to this omission. In particular, with reference to section 2 (3) (b), we think that it is at least open to doubt whether the order as drafted does not confer on the courts in question jurisdiction in matters of prize and in matters arising under the Slave Trade Acts. If it is intended to confer such jurisdiction, we think that it would be advisable to define its extent, as has been done in the past by the application of section 2 (3) (b) of 53 and 54 Vict., cap. 27.

GENERAL.

If such is not the intention, we think that some express provision should be inserted, as was done in "The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868," in order to put the matter beyond any doubt.

(3.) Such jurisdiction shall, subject to the provisions of this Order, be over the like places, persons, matters, and things, when within the limits of the principal Order, as the Admiralty jurisdiction of the High Court in England, whether existing by virtue of any statute or otherwise, and the Court may exercise such jurisdiction in like manner and to as full an extent as the High Court in England, and shall have the same regard as that Court to international law and the comity of nations.

5. Any reference to a Vice-Admiralty Court which is contained in any Act of the Imperial Parliament, or in any law of a British possession applicable within the limits of the principal Order, shall be construed as a reference to the Court or Courts upon which Admiralty jurisdiction is conferred by the principal Order, and such Court shall have jurisdiction accordingly.

Provided that the Court shall not have any greater jurisdiction in relation to the laws and regulations relating to His Majesty's navy at sea, or under any Act providing for the discipline of His Majesty's navy, than may be from time to time conferred on such Court by Order in Council.

6. An action under this Order shall be tried by a Judge sitting alone or with assessors appointed in the prescribed manner.

7.—(1.) Where Provincial Courts have been established by the principal Order, the Judge may, by writing under his hand and the seal of the Court, order that the Registry of a Provincial Court within the jurisdiction of the Court be a District Registry of the Court for the purposes of this Order, and the Registrar and Marshal of the Provincial Court shall, within the jurisdiction of such Provincial Court, be the District Registrar and District Marshal of the Court, and may exercise within such jurisdiction all the prescribed functions and perform all the prescribed duties of the Registrar and Marshal of the Court.

(2.) Where an action has been commenced in a District Registry the Judge may order that such action shall be tried in the Provincial Court; but the making of any such Order shall not affect the power of the Judge to remove the said action at any time to the Supreme Court.

8. In places where there is no District Registry, the Judge may direct that for the purposes of any particular matter or action "the powers of a District Registrar and Marshal may be exercised by the Provincial Court."

9. The territorial waters adjacent to the district of a Provincial Court shall for the purposes of this Order be deemed to be within the jurisdiction of such Provincial Court.

10. An appeal from any judgment of the Court, or of a Provincial Court, under this Order shall be subject to the provisions of the principal Order governing appeals in civil cases, and the Court having cognizance of such appeal shall, for the purpose thereof, possess all the jurisdiction conferred upon the Court by the principal Order or by this Order.

11. "The Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890," section 6, shall apply to appeals from the Court to His Majesty in Council as if the Court were a Colonial Court of Admiralty.

12. Rules of Court for the purposes of this Order shall be made by the same authority, and in the same manner and subject to the same approval, as Rules of Court made in virtue of the powers conferred by the principal Order.

(2.) The Rules of Court and Table of Fees and Costs in force under the repealed Articles shall continue in force until rules are made and have come into force under the provisions of this Order.

14. Nothing in this Order shall affect the criminal jurisdiction of any Court established by the principal Order.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 14, 1909.

Declaration of London:
As to necessity for Parliamentary
sanction.

I HAVE the honour, by the direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you the accompanying papers relating to the Convention, known as the Declaration of London, which was drawn up by the International Naval Conference held in London during the preceding winter, and to request that he may be furnished with your opinion on the question whether it is necessary that this Declaration, in order to render it binding on the Prize Courts and other Tribunals of this country, should be embodied in or sanctioned by an Act of Parliament.

By Article 66 of the Declaration (see p. 34 of "Blue Book, No. 4, Miscellaneous (1909)") the Signatory Powers undertake to issue the necessary instructions, and to take such measures as may be required in order to ensure that it will be applied by their courts, and more particularly by their prize courts.

The question has on one occasion been mentioned in Parliament, and views have from time to time been expressed that Parliamentary sanction is required for this instrument, but Sir Edward Grey is advised that this is not so, and that the Declaration of London will be binding upon British Prize Courts so soon as it has been ratified.

The theoretical basis upon which prize courts exist, whether they are to be looked upon as courts of the law of nations (see "Blackstone's Commentaries," 4th ed., 1876, vol. iii, p. 56) or municipal courts (see Sir Henry Maine's "International Law," p. 96), is somewhat obscure, but the position adopted by Lord Stowell in several cases shows that he regarded himself when sitting in a prize court as bound to enforce, primarily, the law of nations (see, for instance, "The Walsingham Packet," 2 C. Rob. 77 (1 E. P. C. 189)), though bound to take notice of the provisions of an Act of Parliament (ibidem), but apparently only doing so in connection with property claimed on behalf of British subjects.

The question what attitude should be adopted by the Court where a British enactment with a direct bearing on the point at issue was alleged to be contrary to the law of nations, was considered by Lord Stowell in the case of the "Fox and Others" (Edwards 311, 2 E. P. C. 61). The question is discussed at some length on pp. 312 et seq., but no definite answer is given, because Lord Stowell held that the British Orders in Council there referred to, being merely retaliatory measures, were not contrary to the law of nations; and also that the King's Orders and Instructions are presumed to conform themselves to that unwritten law.

It seems to follow from the above cases that Lord Stowell would have regarded the law of nations as binding on the Court per se, and would only have enforced Acts of Parliament, Orders in Council, or other municipal enactments in so far as they were in conformity with that law. The decisions appear to be quite inconsistent with the opinion that municipal legislation is required to justify the Court in applying what it believes to be the law of nations.

Section 55 (5) of the Naval Prize Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict., cap. 25), provides that nothing in that Act shall take away, abridge, contract, further, or otherwise than as expressly provided by the Act, the jurisdiction or authority of a prize court to take cognizance of and judicially proceed upon any capture, seizure, prize, or reprisal of any ships or goods, and to hear and determine the same, and according to the course of Admiralty and the law of nations to adjudge and condemn any ship or goods, or any other jurisdiction or authority of or exercisable by a prize court. The law, therefore, still remains the same to-day as it was in the days of Lord Stowell.

The real purpose of the institution of prize courts is to judge between the Sovereign and the foreign subject as to the validity of captures made by the Sovereign's forces in war, the foreign subject being the previous owner of the goods. It was not intended to judge between the Sovereign and his own subjects, or between those subjects and the foreign subjects as, in principle, all booty or prize in war goes to the Crown, the subject only taking an interest by virtue of the grant from the Crown, which is in theory a matter of grace and not of right.

As the direction of all matters relating to the conduct of war falls within the prerogative of the Crown, there seems on principle no reason why an Agreement between the Sovereign and other States, laying down rules as to what are or are not valid captures, should require parliamentary sanction before the Prize Court can enforce it when judging between the Crown and the subjects or citizens of those foreign Powers.

The Prize Courts in which the application of the rules contained in the recent Declaration will affect British subjects will be the foreign Courts, and not the British Courts, but it can scarcely be urged that the right of a foreign Prize Court to apply the Declaration to the property of a British subject could depend on an English Act of Parliament.

Cases will be found in the Prize Reports in which the provisions of treaties have been treated by the Prize Courts as binding upon them, especially with regard to contraband. The following cases may be cited:—

"Vryheid" (No. 1). Hay and Marriott, 188, 1 E.P.C. 13.

"Endraught." 1 C. Rob. 22, 1 E.P.C. 36.

"Ringende Jacob." 1 C. Rob. 89, 1 E.P.C. 60.

"Twende Brodre." 4 C. Rob. 33, 1 E.P.C. 332.

"Apollo." 4 C. Rob. 158.

"Neptunus." 6 C. Rob. 403, 1 E.P.C. 595.

There is nothing in any of the above cases to show that confirmation of the treaty by an Act of Parliament was considered to be necessary.

The Declaration of Paris, 1856, is now universally regarded as binding on all the States that accepted it, and, so far as Sir E. Grey is aware, it has never been suggested that British Prize Courts would not apply its provisions; but the Declaration of Paris has never been embodied in an Act of Parliament.

It is true that no British prize decisions involving the application of the Declaration have ever been rendered, but it must be remembered that the 2nd and 3rd Articles of that Declaration only embody principles which Great Britain and France had mutually agreed to observe during the Crimean War in order that their previously divergent practices might be harmonized; and there is no case reported which indicates that any captor or claimant of goods thought it feasible to contend that those arrangements were not binding on British Prize Courts, or to argue that ships or cargoes should be released or condemned in disregard of them.

With regard to Courts other than Prize Courts, it is not easy to foresee cases in which such Courts would have to enforce the provisions of the Declaration. Cases might, it is true, arise with regard to insurance, in which it might be necessary to take the Declaration into account, but they would probably in the end turn upon whether or not the Declaration was to be regarded as binding in International Law. Hobbs v. Henning, 17 C.B. (N.S.) 791; and Seymour v. London and Provincial Insurance Company, 41 L.J.C.P. 193, may be cited as instances of the cases that might arise.

Sir E. Grey would be glad if you would take the papers into your consideration and would favour him with your opinion whether the Declaration of London does or does not require Parliamentary sanction in order to render it binding on British Prize Courts. He would also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

I am to add that Sir E. Grey would be obliged if in favouring him with your report you would state whether you have any objection to your opinion being published, should it be subsequently decided, in view of the importance of the question, that it is desirable to take this course.

Report.

In our opinion the Declaration of London does not require the sanction of the Legislature to make it binding on British Prize Courts. It is to be observed that the Declaration does not directly affect the private rights of British subjects in British Courts. British subjects whose property is affected by the action of a belligerent foreign State must seek redress in the Prize Courts of that State. In cases where the Declaration limits the rights of Great Britain as a belligerent power, the Crown will instruct its officers not to enforce the rights in question beyond the agreed limits, and if they were nevertheless to do so the Crown would hold itself responsible for any damages such officers might cause. It follows, therefore, that so far as the Declaration limits or restricts our rights, no claim inconsistent with it can be put forward in our courts. In cases where the Declaration extends belligerent rights beyond what has hitherto been claimed by Great Britain, the only persons who can or will put forward any claims in our courts in respect of the exercise of such new rights will be foreigners, and so far as their position in our Prize Courts is concerned, we think it is clear that the judges of those Courts will apply any treaty existing between their respective countries and the Sovereign of Great Britain. Treaties are a recognised branch of International Law though their direct operation is of course confined to those nations who are parties to them. This principle is well established by a number of cases of which perhaps the best is "Twende Brodre" (4 C. Rob., 33, 1 E.P.C., 332). In that case, the question was whether or not certain goods were contraband. By a Treaty between this country and Denmark it was provided that certain kinds of timber should not be contraband. Lord Stowell considered that effect should be given to the Treaty, without thinking it necessary to enquire whether such kinds of timber would have been innocent goods according to International Law apart from the Treaty. On this principle, our Prize Courts would be bound to apply the Declaration of London to foreigners whose Sovereigns are parties thereto. See also "The Fox" and others Edwards 311 and 2 E.P.C. 61 and "The Walsingham Packet" 2 C. Rob. 77 and 1 E.P.C. 189.

We think that the Declaration casts upon this country no obligation to ensure that the provisions thereof shall be made law in our Courts so as to apply to non-Signatory Powers. Article 66 provides only that the Signatory Powers undertake to secure the reciprocal observance of the rules in cases where all the belligerents are parties to the Declaration. But we are of opinion that the British Prize Courts ought to apply the principles embodied in the Declaration to non-Signatory Powers. If, however, the English Prize Courts take a different view as to the position of non-Signatory Powers there would be no difficulty in then providing by Act of Parliament that they should apply the same principles to non-Signatory as to Signatory Powers, and we think that would be the better way of dealing with this contingency should it arise. In our opinion the international questions dealt with by the Declaration are within the prerogative of the Crown. They all relate to the conduct of war, which is peculiarly within that prerogative, and any Rules to which the Sovereign assents for the purpose of guiding his Officers in the exercise of his rights are independent of Parliamentary sanction.

2. It appears to us that the publication of Law Officers' opinions is undesirable, and we are unable to assent to it in this case.

Annex.

Draft of a Bill to make such Amendments in the Law with respect to International Tribunals, Neutrality, and other matters as are necessary to enable certain Conventions to be carried into effect.

WHEREAS at the Second Peace Conference, held at The Hague in the year 1907, various conventions were drawn up, but it is desirable that the same should not be ratified by His Majesty the King until such amendments of the law as are in this Act contained have been made:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

1.—(1.) A Secretary of State, on the application of any international tribunal constituted in accordance with any treaty or convention to which His Majesty is a party for inquiring into or settling any questions of an international character, shall for the purpose of—

(i.) Enforcing the attendance of witnesses before any such tribunal, wherever sitting, whether within or without His Majesty's dominions, or ~~any members thereof, [and the issue of a commission or request to examine witnesses elsewhere than before the tribunal], before any member of any such tribunal or any other person duly authorised to take evidence in connection with any proceedings before any such tribunal, and~~

(ii.) Compelling the production of documents.

have power to issue orders which shall have the like effect as if the proceedings before the international tribunal were an action in the court and the order were a formal process ~~of issued by the court issued for the like purpose in such an action, and shall be enforceable by the court accordingly, in the due exercise of its jurisdiction, and shall be enforceable by the court accordingly, and disobedience to any such order shall be punishable as contempt of court: provided that—~~

(a.) No person shall be proceeded against or punished for disobedience to any order made under the powers given by this Act unless it shall be made to appear to the court that a reasonable and sufficient sum of money to defray the expenses of going and attending to give evidence and of returning from giving evidence had been tendered to such person at the time when such order was served upon him, and, in any case in which obedience to the order would involve the departure of such person out of the jurisdiction of the court in whose jurisdiction he was at the time when the order was served upon him, that such a further sum was agreed to be paid to him by way of compensation for the loss of time occasioned by his going and attending to give evidence and returning from so doing as to the court may seem, having regard to all the circumstances, to be reasonable and sufficient;

(b.) No person who may be ordered to attend at any place in any foreign State in which he would be liable to be arrested for any act done or omitted by him prior to the service of the order upon him, and who shall upon such service have notified the Secretary of State of his liability to arrest shall be compelled to attend or be punished for not attending at such place unless before the application to the court for the purpose of compelling him to attend or of punishing him for non-attendance a sufficient safe conduct from the foreign State in question shall have been offered to him.

* Alterations in red ink printed in italic.

(2.) A member of any such international tribunal, if not a British subject, shall, whilst residing or travelling in any part of His Majesty's dominions for the purpose of the performance of his duties as such member, enjoy all the privileges which are conferred by law or custom on Ambassadors and public Ministers of foreign States.

(3.) In this section the expression "the court" means in England and Ireland the High Court, in Scotland the Court of Session, and in any other place to which this Act extends a superior court of that place.

(4.) The powers conferred by this section on a Secretary of State may be exercised by him in any place to which this Act extends, and those powers may also be exercised by any of the following officers within their respective jurisdictions; that is to say,—

(i.) In Ireland, by the Lord Lieutenant;

(ii.) In Jersey, by the lieutenant-governor;

(iii.) In Guernsey, Alderney, and Sark, and dependent islands, by the lieutenant-governor;

(iv.) In the Isle of Man, by the lieutenant-governor;

(v.) In India, Canada, and Australia, by the Governor-General, including any person who for the time being has the powers of the Governor-General;

(vi.) In any British possession, by the governor.

2.—(1.) Without prejudice to any other powers exercisable by His Majesty for the purpose of enforcing the obligations of neutrality, His Majesty may by Order in Council—

(a.) Make regulations for preventing or prohibiting, or authorising subject to conditions or restrictions, the supply of fuel or stores to, and the repairing or manning of, ships belonging to any foreign State at war with any other foreign State at peace with His Majesty (in this Act referred to as a friendly State);

(b.) Authorise the arrest and detention of any persons forming part of the crew of any ship belonging to, or of the forces of, any foreign State at war with any friendly State whom His Majesty by virtue of any treaty, convention, or otherwise is under an obligation to intern;

(c.) Prohibit the erection by or on behalf of any foreign State at war with any friendly State of any wireless telegraphic station or any apparatus for the purpose of communicating with their forces on land or sea, and the use of any such station or apparatus established by any such State for purely military purposes before the commencement of the war and not previously opened for the service of public messages;

and the Order may contain such incidental, consequential, and supplemental provisions as may appear to His Majesty to be necessary or proper for the purposes of the Order, and any such Order may be revoked and varied by any subsequent Order in Council.

(2.) If any person contravenes the provisions of any such Order or obstructs any officer in the execution of his duties thereunder he shall be guilty of an offence under "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870," and shall be liable to be proceeded against and punished as if he had been guilty of increasing the warlike force of a foreign ship under section 10 of that Act.

(3.) An Order in Council under this section shall, if made before the outbreak of hostilities between two foreign States, come into force on the issue of a proclamation of neutrality by His Majesty in connection with such outbreak, and if made during such hostilities, come into force on the making thereof, and in either case shall, unless previously revoked, continue in force until the issue of a proclamation declaring such hostilities to be at an end, and whilst in force shall have effect as if enacted in this Act:

Provided that the issue of such last-mentioned proclamation shall not affect any legal proceeding commenced or offence committed whilst the Order in Council was still in force, but any such legal proceeding may be continued, and any such offence prosecuted, as if the Order remained in force.

3.—(1.) A British vessel other than a hospital ship, or a boat belonging thereto, shall not be painted white outside with a broad horizontal band of red or green so as to resemble such a ship or boat, and if any such vessel is so painted the owner or master of the vessel shall be liable to a fine not exceeding 100*l.*, and on a certificate from a surveyor of ships or a Board of Trade inspector under "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," that a vessel is so painted, the vessel may be detained until the defect has been remedied.

(2.) It shall not be lawful to display on any British ship or boat, other than a hospital ship or a boat belonging thereto, the Geneva flag, that is to say, a flag consisting of a red cross on a white ground, formed by reversing the federal colours of the Swiss Confederation, or any flag so nearly resembling the same as to be calculated to deceive, and if any such flag is displayed on any such vessel, the owner or master of the vessel shall be liable to a fine not exceeding 100*l.*

(3.) For the purposes of this and the next succeeding section the expression "hospital ship" means any ship constructed or adapted for the sole purpose of assisting the sick, wounded, or shipwrecked.

(4.) This section shall have effect and be construed as though it were part of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," as amended by any subsequent enactment.

(5.) This section shall not come into operation until three months after the passing of this Act.

4.—(1.) The master of any British ship having on board any sick, wounded, or shipwrecked men, being combatants who have been rescued during or after a naval engagement in which they have taken part, shall, on demand being made in person by or on behalf of a commissioned officer actually in command of a war-ship of any of the belligerent States, deliver to him all such men.

GENERAL.

- (2.) This section shall not, except as respects British hospital ships, extend to cases where the officer making the demand is an officer of a war-ship of a State at war with His Majesty.
- (3.) In this section expressions have the same meaning as in "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," as amended by any subsequent enactment.
- (5.) This Act shall extend to the whole of His Majesty's dominions.
- (6.) This Act may be cited as "The Second Peace Conference (Conventions) Act, 1910."

I HAVE the honour to transmit to you, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, the accompanying draft of an Order in Council, to be called "The Consular Fees (Amendment) Order in Council, 1910," dealing with the transfer of lascar seamen from foreign ships before British consular officers. The circumstances which have rendered advisable the issue of such an Order in Council, which has been drawn up by this Department in consultation with the India Office and the Board of Trade, are set forth in the letter from the India Office of the 2nd October last, copy of which is also enclosed herewith.

Copies of "The Consular Fees (General) Order in Council, 1906," "The China and Corea (Consular and Marriage Fees) Order in Council, 1906," and "The Japan (Consular and Marriage Fees) Order in Council, 1906," are enclosed for convenience of reference.

I have the honour to request that you will take the draft Order into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to whether it may, in its present form, be laid before the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

Consular Fees (Amendment) Order in Council, 1910.

WHEREAS, by "The Consular Salaries and Fees Act, 1891," His Majesty the King is authorised by Order in Council to fix the fees to be taken in respect of any matter or thing done by a consular officer in the execution of his office, and to vary such fees by way of increase or decrease, and to abolish fees and to create new fees;

And whereas it is expedient that the tables of fees, as now fixed by "The Consular Fees (General) Order in Council, 1906," "The China and Corea (Consular and Marriage Fees) Order in Council, 1906," and "The Japan (Consular and Marriage Fees) Order in Council, 1906," should in certain respects be amended;

GENERAL.—JAPAN.

Now, therefore, in pursuance of the before-mentioned Act, His Majesty is pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, as follows:—

1. This Order may be cited as "The Consular Fees (Amendment) Order in Council, 1910."
2. The following fee is hereby established, and shall be deemed to be added to Part II of the table of fees respectively annexed to "The Consular Fees (General) Order in Council, 1906," "The China and Corea (Consular and Marriage Fees) Order in Council, 1906," and "The Japan (Consular and Marriage Fees) Order in Council, 1906":—

"45 A.—For certifying the engagement, or discharge of, or the leaving behind of or for certifying any alteration in the agreement made under section 115 of "The Indian Merchant Shipping Act, 1859," with a lascar seaman by the master of a foreign ship, or for certifying the death of or the desertion of his ship by any such seaman, 2s.

"45 B.—For certifying the transfer of one or more lascar seamen with their agreements from one foreign ship to another foreign ship, per man, 4s.

"Note.—The fee under 45 (B) is inclusive of and not additional to the engagement and discharge fee in (A), and should be divided equally between the two ships concerned. The total maximum fee charged to both ships should not exceed 5l."

3. In all copies of the Orders in Council referred to in the preceding articles which may be printed after the commencement of this Order, the fee directed by this Order to be added to the tables of fees annexed to the said Orders shall be added thereto.

4. This Order shall come into operation on the 1st day of September, 1910, or at such later date as in the case of any particular consular jurisdiction, or part thereof, one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, by any general or particular instructions, may from time to time direct.

And the Right Honourable Sir Edward Grey, Baronet, one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, is to give the necessary directions herein.

Sir Edward Grey to the Lord Chancellor.

SECRETARY SIR E. GREY presents his compliments to the Lord Chancellor, and would be much obliged if his Lordship would favour him with his opinion on the question whether legislation is desirable in connexion with certain marriages of British subjects which have been solemnized in Japan.

In the early part of the year 1908 a petition was brought before the High Court of Justice in England by Charles William Marshall for the dissolution of a marriage between him and Kate Saville Corfield solemnized in Japan on the 24th October, 1899, in an English church in that country, according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England.

Evidence was given in the course of the case to the effect that the marriage had not been registered in accordance with the Japanese law, and was therefore not a valid marriage in contemplation of the lex loci. Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane therefore held that there was no marriage to dissolve, but gave leave to amend the petition into one for a declaration that the marriage was null and void, on the ground that it had not been registered as required by the law of Japan, and at a later date, after service of the amended petition, he made a decree nisi of nullity of marriage accordingly.

The case has not been reported in the "Law Reports," but was reported in the "Times," and a copy of such report is included in the papers (Paper (A)).

Up till the 16th July, 1899, Great Britain enjoyed extra-territorial jurisdiction in Japan, but on that date the treaty of 1894, under which that jurisdiction was surrendered, came into force.

There can be no doubt but that up till the 16th July, 1899, marriages between British subjects solemnized in accordance with the rites of the Church of England were valid because they were solemnized in accordance with English law, but the effect which the disappearance of the old treaty rights would have upon marriages so solemnized was not generally realised by the British community in Japan, and in several cases similar marriages were solemnized after the date when the new treaty came into force. Altogether, some thirty cases have been traced where the parties have been married in English churches in Japan since the 16th July, 1899, without any registration under the Japanese law being subsequently effected.

It appears probable that none of these marriages would be recognised as valid by an English court, and in consequence a feeling of considerable anxiety exists among the parties to these marriages as to their real position (see Papers (B) and (C)).

Sir E. Grey considers it most desirable that steps should be taken to regularize the position of the parties in question, who acted in perfect good faith, but he has been advised that legislation will be required to render these marriages valid in contemplation of English law.

He would be glad if the Lord Chancellor would be so good as to inform him whether his Lordship considers the above view to be correct, and whether he thinks it is desirable that legislation should be promoted with this object.

In the event of the Lord Chancellor being of opinion that legislation is desirable, Sir E. Grey would also be glad of an expression of opinion as to the lines upon which the Bill should be prepared. One possible course would be to specify the names of the parties to the various marriages which have been traced and are known not to have been registered in accordance with Japanese law, and declare them valid according to English law. In this case, it would be necessary to omit the marriage between Mr. Marshall and Miss Corfield which has been annulled, and one of the parties to which has since married another person.

An alternative course would be to follow the precedent of "The Greek Marriages Act, 1884" (copy of which is enclosed) (Paper (D)), and enable the parties to petition the court for a declaration that the marriage was valid.

Sir E. Grey would be grateful for any observations of a general nature which the Lord Chancellor may be good enough to offer.

Memorandum for Sir E. Grey as to Japanese Marriages alleged to be invalid for want of Registration in Japan.

THIS kind of case has occurred before, and it is due to the intricacy of the marriage laws.

I certainly think there ought to be legislation to validate these Japanese marriages, omitting, of course, the Marshall marriage, which has been declared null by the Probate and Divorce Court here. I agree with Sir E. Grey's view.

In regard to the lines on which legislation should proceed, I think the Bill ought to contain—

1. A general enactment that any marriage of the kind, solemnized in Japan up to the passing of the Act, in good faith by either party, to which objection may be made for non-registration, may be validated ab initio, with a proviso excluding such marriages as have been declared invalid by a competent court, the Marshall case, and cases where one of the parties has subsequently contracted another marriage valid in law.

I say "in good faith by either party," because no one ought to be allowed to take advantage of his or her own fraud. But probably there is no such case.

2. A machinery clause, such as clause 1 of "The Greek Marriages Act, 1884," to enable anyone to procure the validation of his or her marriage under this Act by going to the court.

3. A specific clause scheduling such marriages of the kind as are traced and are known not to be registered. It is not desirable to put these people to the expense and anxiety of a litigation in England, and these marriages might be declared valid ab initio without more ado. Any doubtful cases might be omitted and the parties left to apply to the court under the earlier and general provision, which would also be applicable to cases which may exist, but are not traced.

I strongly deprecate any clause like clause 2 of the Greek Marriages Act. I think it would be most unjust to the children in cases of settled property or titles or even intestacy. Strangers can have no right to exclude a widow or children from their share or patrimony by reason of a technical oversight.

The clauses, especially that defining the kind of marriages (in church, for example, or chapel, or before a consular or other officer) which are to be regularized, must be very carefully drawn. The Greek Marriages Act in this respect would not be a very useful precedent. I will revise them with the draughtsman if Sir E. Grey desires it. I suggest also that Lord Gorell, the greatest living authority on this subject, might be asked his opinion. I should readily defer to his judgment in regard to the marriage law and its intricacies.

Very likely the Foreign Office has already given full instructions to its agents abroad as to how marriages can safely be contracted in foreign countries. If not, I venture to suggest that they might consider this.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, January 3, 1910.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit herewith the draft of an Order in Council, to be called "The Ottoman Order in Council, 1910," and certain papers connected therewith.

The grounds upon which Sir E. Grey considers it desirable that the Order in Council of 1899 (see Paper A), as amended by the Order of 1905 (Paper B), should be superseded by a new Order are explained in the first paragraph of the Memorandum by Mr. Hurst, Assistant Legal Adviser to this Department (Paper C), accompanying a draft Order prepared by him in September of last year (Paper D).

The last-mentioned draft was referred to the Judge of His Majesty's Supreme Consular Court for the Ottoman dominions, whose observations upon it (Paper E) led to the preparation of the amended draft now submitted to you.

The points in which it is proposed to alter the existing Order in Council, and the reasons for the alterations, will, Sir E. Grey thinks, be found to be sufficiently explained in (1) the Memorandum above referred to (Paper C), and (2) the accompanying further Memorandum dated the 8th September, 1909 (Paper F).

Sir Edward desires, however, to call your special attention to the suggested Article 62 of the final draft, enabling sentence of death pronounced by the Supreme Court to be carried into execution upon the direction to that effect of His Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, or, as the case may be, of His Majesty's Agent and Consul-General at Cairo.

The annexed Memorandum (Paper G) shows that the system which now prevails—that of recording judgment of death, and subsequently directing a punishment of imprisonment not exceeding twenty years—was adopted in 1860 as a result of the most careful consideration by Lord John Russell (then Foreign Secretary), Mr. Hammond, and Lord Wodehouse, with the assistance of the Law Officers at the time. The practice then established has continued without alteration down to the present time, and, although in the absence of sufficient reasons to the contrary, it is no doubt desirable to assimilate the punishment provided by the Ottoman Order in Council to the punishment provided in the like circumstances by other Orders in Council governing British extra-territorial jurisdiction elsewhere, as well as to that provided in the mother country and in the King's dominions beyond the seas, Sir Edward is not prepared to sanction the alteration of the uninterrupted practice of fifty years except upon a definite recommendation to that effect by the Law Officers of the Crown.

Council—

I am to request you to take the draft Order into your consideration, and to favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval. Sir Edward will also be glad if you will indicate such amendments and modifications (if any) in the draft as you may consider necessary or desirable, and will add any observations of a general nature upon it which you may desire to offer.

Report.

In our opinion, the change proposed to be effected by Article 62 of the draft Ottoman Order in Council, 1910, is one which should in the interests of justice be made.

The effect of the existing Ottoman Order in Council is that, if a murder is committed by a British subject in the Ottoman dominions and is tried in the Supreme Court there, he cannot suffer a greater sentence than imprisonment with hard labour for twenty years. If for such a murder a British subject is tried in England under "The Offences against the Person Act, 1861," section 9, or in some other part of the King's dominions under "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," section 6, he may suffer the sentence of death. Thus, the sentence actually suffered varies according to the place where the criminal is tried, and may depend upon the question whether there is evidence available for use in England or some other part of the King's dominions. A murder of the worst description might be committed by a British subject in the Ottoman dominions, and yet the witnesses, although they could give evidence in the Supreme Court there, might not be available at a trial elsewhere, and in such a case the offender would escape the extreme penalty.

The present system leaves untouched cases other than murder for which the capital sentence can be inflicted, e.g., treason and piracy.

According to the terms of the existing Order, the capital sentence might be carried out after a trial in the Supreme Court for one of these offences, but could not be carried out in the case of a trial for murder there.

There seems to be no reason why the Orders in Council applicable to China and Corea and to Siam should sanction the execution of the sentence of death pronounced in the British Courts in these countries while the Order in Council applicable to the Ottoman dominions should not sanction a similar proceeding in those dominions. It is worthy of note that since the determination of Lord John Russell to establish the present system, the power of recording a death sentence in cases of murder has been taken from the Courts in England by "The Offences against the Person Act, 1861," section 2.

As regards the place where the death sentence is to be carried into execution, under Article 62 of the draft Order, this is to a great extent an administrative matter; probably it would be better to have it carried out in one of the British possessions specified in Article 65, but to allow the power to remain of having it carried out in the Ottoman dominions. The places in the British possessions where the sentence might be carried out should be determined by directions given by Order in Council under section 7 of "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890." It is perhaps not desirable that the sentence should be carried out by the Turkish authorities. If Article 62 is retained, and it is thought advisable to resort to the provisions of section 7 of "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," Articles 65 and 133 will need some alterations. In Article 65 (1) the words "execution or" should be inserted before "imprisonment" in 1 (7), and in Article 133 the words "or execution" should be inserted after the word "imprisonment" in 1 (2).

As regards the rest of the Order, Article 71 is too wide in its terms, and should be limited by the insertion after the word "control" in line 2 of the words "situate in the Ottoman dominions."

Article 105 raises questions of the greatest difficulty and complexity.

It is difficult to see how it can be reconciled with Article 90, to which it is in part made subject. Moreover, real property in the Ottoman dominions is not within the jurisdiction of the Consular Courts at all, as British subjects can only hold such property in Turkey on condition that in respect of their ownership of such property they are solely amenable to the Ottoman Courts (see the Protocol of the 28th July, 1868). Lastly, it is very doubtful whether there is any power to make such a provision as that contained in the Article, which seems quite outside the terms of "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890." It would probably be better to omit this Article.

Subject to the foregoing observations, the terms of the draft Order are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

[April 15, 1910.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 22, 1910.

BY the direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I have the honour to submit to you papers, as detailed in the enclosed list, relative to a proposed amalgamation of the British and Turkish steam navigation interests on the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers.

In 1861 a British company, entitled the Euphrates and Tigris Steam Navigation Company, was formed for the purposes of trade and of carrying on a service of steam-vessels on the two rivers, under rights conceded by the Turkish Government to already existing British firms. Translations of the firman of 1834 and of the Grand Vizier's letters of 1842, 1846, and 1861, on which the rights of the British company to navigate the rivers are founded, are enclosed in the letter of the company of the 20th December last (Paper E). These rights have, however, been slightly extended since 1861, the company having been authorised to keep three steamers on the rivers instead of two, and to supplement their carrying capacity by towing barges.

Subsequently to 1861 commercial steam-vessels were placed on the rivers by the Turkish Government, and these were for some years previous to the Turkish revolution administered out of the civil list of the ex-Sultan Abdul Hamid II, running in competition with the British company's boats. They are now under the direct control of the Turkish Government.

In the summer of 1909 negotiations were entered into between the Euphrates and Tigris Steam Navigation Company and the Turkish Government with a view to effecting an amalgamation of the British and Turkish navigation interests on the Euphrates and Tigris Rivers. In these negotiations, which are still in progress, the British company have received the general support of His Majesty's Government, and a copy of a draft convention, designed to effect the proposed fusion, will be found among the papers enclosed in this letter (Paper A). This draft convention, though necessarily in an incomplete form, indicates generally the lines on which it is intended to carry out the proposed fusion. It will be seen that a new company is to be formed under Ottoman laws which shall take over the present rights and the steam-boats, docks, &c., belonging both to the existing British company and to the Turkish Government. The new company is to have exclusive rights of steam navigation in the two rivers for a stated number of years and over a certain defined area. There are also stipulations as to the apportionment of shares in the proposed new company into which it is not necessary to enter for the purposes of this reference.

In the course of the negotiations the Turkish Government have required, as a conditio sine qua non to their acceptance of the convention, the insertion of an additional article, which is not given in the draft enclosed herein (Paper A), but which in the letter of the Euphrates and Tigris Steam Navigation Company of the 1st December last (Paper D) is quoted as follows:—

“The privileges accorded to Mr. Lynch by the Imperial Government, and enjoyed by the vessels of the Euphrates and Tigris Steam Navigation Company (Limited), which at present conduct the navigation service on the Tigris, shall be completely annulled upon the promulgation of the Imperial firman confirming these presents, and upon the completion of the official transfer to the Société of the rights, privileges, and property to be brought into ‘apport’ by the Ottoman Government in accordance with article 8.

“In confirmation of this limitation the concessionnaire must obtain from Mr. Lynch a declaration to the above effect, confirmed by the English authorities, and hand the same to the Minister of Public Works at the time of the exchange of signatures to the convention, the ‘cahier des charges,’ and the statutes.”

The Euphrates and Tigris Steam Navigation Company state that they are prepared to assent to the inclusion in the proposed convention of the above-quoted article, provided that in the event of the concession being at any time withdrawn by the Turkish Government from the new company they would not be precluded from a return to their existing rights. To ascertain their legal rights in this respect the company have taken the opinion of Mr. W. F. Hamilton, K.C., a copy of which is enclosed in their letter of the 20th December. It is understood that no formal case was submitted to Mr. Hamilton, but that the opinion was written on the statement enclosed in the letter of the 20th December (Paper E), supplemented by verbal explanations. It will be seen that in Mr. Hamilton’s opinion the company would, in the contingency contemplated, be entitled to claim a restitutio in integrum or equivalent compensation.

The Euphrates and Tigris Steam Navigation Company have now enquired whether, if the Turkish Government should claim the power to put an end to the proposed new concession on the ground of some alleged or trifling breach of its provisions by the concessionnaire company, or on political or other grounds, His Majesty’s Government would adopt and support the view expressed by Mr. Hamilton.

I am accordingly directed by Secretary Sir Edward Grey to request that you will be so good as to take these papers into your consideration, and to favour him with your opinion—

1. Whether in the event of the withdrawal of the concession by the Turkish Government in the circumstances mentioned above the company would be entitled to demand a revival of the status quo ante, and to be restored to the rights and privileges which they at present enjoy, taking into consideration the insertion in the proposed convention of the article quoted above, which formally annuls the rights of the existing British company, and which is required to be confirmed in writing by His Majesty’s Government.

2. If your answer to the preceding question should be in the affirmative, whether the company would be entitled to the support of His Majesty’s Government in presenting such a demand on their behalf to the Turkish Government.

Sir Edward Grey would also be glad to receive any observations of a general character that you may desire to offer on the papers now submitted to you.

I have, &c.

Report.

In our opinion:—

1. Treating the matter as one between two subjects, and to be decided according to English law, there is not any ground on which the Euphrates and Tigris Company could as of right demand the restoration of the status quo ante in the event of the withdrawal of the new concession by the Turkish Government. Such a withdrawal would in English law amount to a breach of contract for which full pecuniary compensation would be awarded, but for which, in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation inducing the contract, restitutio in integrum would not be awarded. Further, in this case the remedy could only be obtained in the Turkish courts, except in the very unlikely event of the Turkish Government submitting to the jurisdiction of an English court, and even if the Turkish Government did submit, the governing law would be the Turkish law, and it does not appear whether by that law there is any remedy against the Government, or under what circumstances the Government might be entitled, notwithstanding the articles of the concession, to withdraw it. Although there may be no legal or equitable right enforceable in a court of law or equity to restore the status, the company might, in the event of the withdrawal of the concession, claim a restoration of the status quo by a direct representation to the Turkish Government, on the ground that the company had entered into the contract and had consented to the annulment on the faith of the condition that the concession would be continued for the specified time, and therefore that the withdrawal of the concession was a breach of faith towards them.

2. In the event of such a representation being made the company would be entitled to the support of His Majesty’s Government.

3. His Majesty’s Government, in assenting to the annulment of the existing English rights, should state that the Government does so subject to the condition that the new concession is continued for the prescribed time, and that if the concession is withdrawn before the expiration of the prescribed time, or if the new company is dissolved, the English company (which we understand is to continue in existence throughout the period of the concession) will be restored to the rights and privileges which they enjoyed before the annulment.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 6, 1910.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to inform you that he has carefully considered your letter of the 7th March respecting the draft Ottoman Order in Council, 1910, and more especially the observations contained in that letter relative to the proposed adoption of article 62 of the draft Order providing for the infliction of the death penalty in cases of murder.

The considerations which led to the adoption of the present system, that of recording judgment of death, and subsequently directing a punishment of imprisonment not exceeding twenty years, were fully set out in the Memorandum (Paper G) enclosed in my letter of the 3rd January last, and on reconsideration of the question in the light of your observations, Sir Edward Grey has arrived at the conclusion that, unless it could be clearly shown that grave evil had in practice followed from the system, which has been in force for more than fifty years, it would be inadvisable to change that system, even though it might be theoretically open to some objection on the score of inconsistency.

Sir E. Grey has satisfied himself that no such evil has resulted, and, on the other hand, he is most anxious to avoid the administrative difficulties which might possibly arise when the death penalty had to be inflicted.

He shares to the full the doubts expressed by you as to the desirability of its infliction in the Ottoman dominions by or with the aid of the Turkish authorities, while he would be most unwilling to adopt the alternative of sending a convicted

British subject to Malta or Gibraltar for the express purpose of being executed, a proceeding which would, he feels sure, be repugnant to a large section of public opinion, and which ought, if possible, to be avoided.

In the circumstances, Sir E. Grey has decided on political grounds to adhere to the system at present in force.

For these reasons the draft Order in Council has been revised by the substitution for Article 62, as it previously stood, of a new Article, which reproduces almost textually Article 46 of the Order 1899, but the Article has been extended to cover other capital cases as well as murder. Article 65 has also been amended, and the alteration you desired in Article 71 has been made. Article 105 has been omitted, and Article 104 has been divided into two Articles, so as to avoid the necessity for renumbering all the succeeding Articles.

I have the honour therefore to return the draft Order as amended, and to request that you will be so good as to reinitial it.

Marriages of Englishwomen to foreigners:
As to instructions to Registrars where validity abroad is doubtful.

ON the 1st February, 1908, Margaret May Rich, a British subject, was married to Zarek Bakirgian, a Turkish subject of Armenian race, at the Chorlton Register Office. At the time of giving notice she was warned by the Deputy Superintendent Registrar that the marriage might not be legal in the Ottoman Dominions, and was advised to see that any necessary formalities requisite to secure such legality should be taken.

The marriage had, in fact, no validity in contemplation of Turkish law, because in the Ottoman Empire the various churches enjoy the privilege of deciding questions affecting the personal status of their members, and the Armenian Church does not recognise a civil marriage.

The husband left for Smyrna the day following. After three months' absence he wrote asking his wife to join him, but owing to her not having acquired Turkish nationality by this marriage, as it was not recognised, she was unable to obtain a passport. She received no replies to her letters, and was informed by the partner in her husband's firm at Manchester that her husband's father refused to acknowledge the marriage. Mrs. Bakirgian appealed to His Majesty's Consul-General at Smyrna, who reported to His Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople that he had ascertained that Bakirgian had betrothed himself to the daughter of M. Boubli, an Armenian lawyer. The Consul-General saw the Armenian Archbishop who, however, refused to intervene on the ground that the civil marriage in England could not be recognised by the Armenian Church. The Armenian Patriarch took the same view. The facts were communicated to M. Boubli and also to his daughter, but in view of the opinions expressed by the Armenian Archbishop and Patriarch they decided to go on with the marriage, which was accordingly solemnised on the 27th January, 1909.

This procedure apparently leaves the English lady in the position of being Zarek Bakirgian's wife in contemplation of English law, and thereby incapacitated from contracting another marriage.

* The Order is contained in the "London Gazette" of November 18, 1910. [Conf. No. 9745*]

The Registrar-General desires, therefore, to be favoured with the opinion and advice of the Law Officers on the following—Query.

1. Whether the Registrar-General is or is not entitled to instruct the Superintendent Registrar not to issue a licence or certificate for the purpose of a marriage in England between a male foreigner and a female British subject, where the Registrar-General has reason to believe that in the country to which the intended husband belongs the latter will be entitled to repudiate the marriage without legal proceedings, and will be free to contract another marriage;

2. Whether the Registrar-General is or is not entitled to instruct the Superintendent Registrar not to issue a licence or certificate for the purpose of a marriage in England between a male foreigner and a female British subject, where the Registrar-General has reason to believe that in the country to which the intended husband belongs the latter could, by process of law, obtain a decision declaring the marriage to be null and void and rendering him free to contract another marriage, on the ground that a marriage contracted in England does not fulfil the legal requirements for a valid marriage in the country to which the intended husband belongs or of his personal law.

The Acts dealing with the issue of certificates and licences by Superintendent Registrars are—

- 6 & 7 Will. IV, cap. 85.
- 7 Will. IV and 1 Vict., cap. 22.
- 3 & 4 Vict., cap. 72.
- 19 & 20 Vict., cap. 119.
- 61 & 62 Vict., cap. 58.
- 6 Edw. VII, cap. 40.

(The last-named Act has not yet been put into force as regards section 2.)

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

1 and 2. We are clearly of opinion that the Registrar-General is not entitled to issue to the Superintendent Registrar instructions such as are referred to in either of these questions.

The Registrar is a ministerial, and not a judicial, officer, and he could only decide that there were good grounds for his refusal to issue a licence or certificate if he took upon himself to make an investigation which is outside his province, and which might indeed often involve most difficult questions of foreign law.

We wish to point out that, if a woman marries a foreigner in England in a form recognised by English law, the circumstance that the law of her foreign husband's domicile does not recognise that form as effective to create a valid marriage does not in the least prevent the marriage from being valid and binding on both parties in England. Nor does the marriage cease to be a valid marriage in England merely because the courts of the foreign husband's domicile subsequently declare that marriage to be null on account of want of formality (Ogden v. Ogden (1908), p. 46; Chetti v. Chetti (1909), p. 67). Such a declaration, though it may render the husband free to contract another marriage abroad, would not appear to entitle him to marry again in England. Thus, even apart from the ministerial nature of the Registrar's office, this consideration would, we think, make it improper for an official who is solely concerned with English marriages to issue such instructions.

We do not, however, see any objection to the Registrar—in a proper case—warning the bride that the contemplated marriage may not be regarded as legal and binding abroad.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 21, 1910.

Mode of enforcing claims against His Majesty's Government, &c.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you herewith a note from the United States Chargé d'Affaires in London (document (A)) requesting information with regard to the enforcement of claims against His Majesty's Government and municipal corporations in this country.

Sir E. Grey is aware that authoritative declarations of law on this or any other subject can only be made by a competent Court of law sitting judicially for the decision of a question properly brought before it. Nevertheless, he considers it desirable, for political reasons, to give the United States Government as much information as possible in answer to their inquiry.

After consultation with the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury the enclosed Memorandum (document (B)) has been drafted, in concert with Mr. Mellor, the Treasury Solicitor, and Sir E. Grey proposes, with your concurrence, to communicate it to the United States Ambassador, pointing out, however, that the authority of the replies thus given is not conclusive.

He would therefore be obliged if you would favour him with your opinion as to the correctness of the proposed answers. He would at the same time be glad to receive any observations of a more general character which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.

Revised Answers.

1. A foreign Government is exempt from the jurisdiction of a British Court, but it is entitled to waive its privilege and appear as plaintiff in its own name in any British Court for the purpose of suing a private person who is subject to the jurisdiction of that Court, whether the claim arises out of contract or of tort.

If by "public claim" is meant a claim by a foreign Government against the Government of His Britannic Majesty no such action could be brought directly against the Government of the Crown by a foreign Sovereign. It is conceivable that an action might be brought by a foreign Government against an individual in the Courts of this country which would in reality be an action against the Government, but such a case would not come within the question of principle stated in the question.

2. No special Courts exist in this country for the trial and enforcement of private claims against the Government. Where suit can be instituted for the enforcement of such claims, it can be done in the ordinary Courts.

UNITED STATES.

3. A "Petition of Right" lies against the Crown for the recovery of land, or goods, or money in the possession of the Crown, or for compensation in money, if restitution cannot be given. This remedy is also open when a claim arises out of contract, as for goods supplied to the Crown or for the public service.

A petition of right cannot be brought without the fiat of the Crown, signified through the Home Secretary. The granting of the fiat is an act of grace, but in practice it is never refused where a prima facie case is made out.

A petition of right does not lie in respect of a claim founded upon tort, the reason being that in theory the Crown can do no wrong.

Claims against the Government arising out of tort must therefore be brought against the individual wrongdoer, but in such cases, if the individual was acting in the discharge of his duty, the usual practice is for the case is usually very frequently to be conducted by the Government authorities, and where the plaintiff is successful, for the damages to be are paid out of public funds.

In several cases proceedings by way of ordinary action against certain Government Departments are allowed by statute. Information with regard to these special cases can be supplied, if desired, but the subject is treated generally in G. S. Robertson's, "Civil Proceedings by and against the Crown."

4. A judgment against the Crown on a petition of right is satisfied in the manner provided in sections 13 and 14 of "The Petitions of Right Act, 1860," of which a copy is enclosed.

There can be little doubt that as regards the ordinary cases of petition of right, i.e., cases not relating to matters personal to the Sovereign, assuming the Treasury to have in hand money voted or made applicable by Parliament for the purpose of satisfying such a judgment, mandamus would lie to them to enforce payment. The question has not, however, ever arisen, because payment is made as a matter of course directly a judgment is obtained against the Crown.

No provision was made in these sections for judgments involving the restoration of lands or other specific hereditaments or chattels because the judgment itself has the effect of "ouster le main" and the Crown is thereby put out of possession.

Where proceedings are taken against a Department in the cases where such a course is possible, the damages awarded are paid out of moneys provided by Parliament for the purpose, but such damages are always paid at once, the money being advanced out of the Civil Contingencies Fund if the Department has Treasury have no other moneys available for the particular purpose.

5. Municipal corporations are, except in so far as they are not liable for non-feasances, liable for injuries to private parties resulting from the negligence or other wrongful act of their employés on the same principle and to the same extent as private employers are responsible for the acts of their servants, but under "The Public Authorities' Protection Act, 1893," actions against such authorities upon the above grounds must be commenced within six months, and certain special rules as to costs are enacted. A copy of this statute is enclosed.

With regard to the police, however, it should be observed that a municipal corporation, even when it appoints and pays them, is not responsible for their negligent acts; and there are other officers whom the Corporation appoints and pays but for whose negligence it is not responsible.

The statement of the law as given above only applies while there is a state of peace between us and the foreign country in question.

There is one rule of procedure which is specially applicable to a foreign Government or a foreign plaintiff, namely, the rule requiring security for costs to be given unless the plaintiff has available assets within the jurisdiction.

In respect of "acts of State" a foreign litigant is in a different position from a subject litigant, and the defence of "act of State" may be raised against the foreigner when it could not be raised if the parties were both subjects.

Gentlemen,

*Foreign Office, February 16, 1911.*Conference on Aerial Navigation: Sovereignty of State over the airspace.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to enclose, for your consideration, the papers noted in the accompanying list respecting the international conference on aerial navigation.

This conference met at Paris on the 18th May last, and was, on the motion of the British delegates, adjourned on the following 29th June to enable the Governments concerned to give full consideration to certain important questions on which a strong divergence of opinion had been found to exist. It has not yet reassembled, but it is anticipated that its meetings will recommence at an early date. A copy of the draft convention which was drawn up ad referendum at the conference is enclosed (Paper A).

As will be seen from the accompanying copy of correspondence with His Majesty's Ambassador at Paris (Papers B and C), it has been suggested that some form of preliminary declaration should be proposed to the Powers to the effect that the air superincumbent upon the territories of each State is as absolutely the property of such State as is the subjacent earth. Such a declaration would strengthen the hands of His Majesty's Government in securing the general recognition of the principle that each State should have liberty of action in regard to the control of foreign air-ships entering the air above its territory and territorial waters. Doubts have, however, been expressed as to the validity of a claim on the part of the State as ultimus heres (or of the Sovereign as Lord Paramount) in contradistinction or in addition to the claim of the private owner of the immediately subjacent land to "property" in the air, and the opinion has been advanced that such a claim should be confined to "sovereignty," in which case the proposed declaration would be to the effect that "the air superincumbent upon the territories of each State is as absolutely under the sovereignty of such State as is the subjacent earth."

There would appear to be a theoretical difficulty in conceding to the State a right of "property" in the air-space, except over land owned by the State. Of course it might be possible to invoke the dogma of English land law, based on feudal conceptions, that the King owns every bit of English soil, each tenant having only an estate in the land. It might then be held that the King owns the entire air-space above the land, the tenant's estate in the land, including also the air-space above it. Upon this view it might thus be held that the State has the "property" in the air superincumbent upon the land. At the same time, it must be recognised that this doctrine of the King's ownership of land is peculiar to English law and systems of law derived from it. Most systems of law concede to individuals full rights of ownership; and, indeed, in present-day English law the tenant in fee-simple seems to have, for all practical purposes, the true proprietary right in the land. There is some difficulty in holding that both the private landowner and the State have rights of "property" in the same piece of land and in the same air-space above that land. The State, it is true, owns privately—that is, on principles of the private law—certain tracts or pieces of land; and this right of property in these pieces of realty would clearly include the right of property in the air-space above them. As regards such pieces of land and the air-space above them, the State would clearly seem to have, on the sovereignty view, both the private law right of property and the public law right of sovereign dominion. Apart from such pieces of realty thus actually owned by the State, it seems sound to hold that the landowner, whoever he may be, owns the air-space above his land, but that the State has the same full right of sovereign dominion in that air-space which it has as regards that land itself; the landowner having the private law right, and the State the public law right.

There is further the question of the "right of innocent passage." No doubt publicists are not unanimous in opinion as to the legal character of the State's right in territorial waters, more especially the 3-mile strip, some—and perhaps the majority—maintaining that the State has sovereign dominions, limited by the right of innocent passage for foreign merchant-vessels, while others contend that the State's rights are less than even this limited sovereignty, amounting in reality to rights of "conservation" only, rights enabling the State to take measures for its own protection and welfare.

The question, therefore, naturally arises as to whether the adoption of the view that the State has sovereignty in the air-space above its territory and territorial waters involves the limitation upon that sovereignty by a right of innocent passage for foreign merchant air-vessels.

It is, perhaps, best to distinguish (1) the air-space above territorial waters (including the 3-mile strip) from (2) the air-space above the territory (land) itself.

State sovereignty limited by right of innocent passage in territorial waters might seem at first sight to involve naturally and necessarily the admission of State sovereignty limited by right of innocent passage for foreign merchant air-vessels in the air-space above the territorial waters. But a distinction can be drawn between territorial waters (especially the 3-mile strip) and the air-space above them. As far as the 3-mile strip of coastal waters is concerned, the coast-line itself acts as a natural and effective barrier to the passage of sea vessels from the strip into the territory itself (except, of course, where some water-way opens into the territory); while the imaginary air-line rising everywhere just above the coast-line usque ad caelum cannot in the nature of things act as a natural and effective barrier to the passage of air-vessels from the 3-mile perpendicular strip of air-space into the air-space above the territory (land) itself. It would be very difficult—and often indeed quite impossible—to prevent the entry into the air-space above the territory itself of air-vessels enjoying a right of innocent passage in the 3-mile strip of air-space. Greater inconvenience and greater danger to the territorial State would therefore seem to result from the admission of a right of innocent passage through the 3-mile strip of air-space than now result from the admission of a right of innocent passage through the subjacent 3-mile strip of water. These natural differences between the air-strip and the water-strip, together with the necessary consequences, would seem sufficiently great to prevent the adoption of the view that the right of innocent passage now existing in the one case must, on analogy, be conceded in the other case also. In other words, the admission of a State sovereignty, limited by right of innocent passage, in the water-strip does not force one to admit that a State sovereignty in the air-strip must likewise be limited by a right of innocent passage.

The argument seems even stronger as regards the air-space over the State's territory itself. The 3-mile strip of coastal waters is extremely useful to the State in maintaining its welfare and safety, but is not, perhaps, after all, strictly speaking, absolutely essential to State existence (note, for instance, inland States); while the air-space above the territory of all States is in reality absolutely essential to State existence itself. The existence of a right of innocent passage in the 3-mile strip of water seems to be of far less significance to the State than the existence of such a right in the air-space would be. While the State may therefore safely admit that its sovereign dominion over the water-strip is thus limited by the right of innocent passage, no State could safely admit that even a right of innocent passage should limit its sovereign dominion in the air-space directly over its own territory. State welfare and even existence demand unlimited sovereignty in the air-space just as they have demanded unlimited sovereignty over the territory itself; the land and the superincumbent column of air being far more intimately connected with and related to each other than is the case with the land and the adjacent strip of coastal water.

The analogies of the high sea and the 3-mile strip of coastal waters do not therefore on the whole appear to be safe ones to follow. It seems consistent with legal principle to maintain that, while the State's sovereignty over territorial waters may well be limited by right of innocent passage, yet no such limitation can exist as regards the State's sovereign dominion in (1) the air-space over territorial waters and in (2) the air-space over the State's territory itself. Admitting full sovereignty, each State can then grant such favours and subject them to such suitable limitations and conditions as it sees fit. Foreign merchant- or other air-vessels might be granted revocable licences to fly in the State's air-space which is subject to the State's full sovereign dominion.

As indicated earlier, there seems to be theoretical objections to maintaining a doctrine of the State's "property" in the air-space (except in the air-space over land in fact owned by the State); and it is open to question whether more could be

FRANCE.

4 claimed for the State by adopting the phraseology "property" or even "full property," since what is really meant after all is the public law right of "sovereignty" or "full sovereignty." It may, perhaps, be safer to assert the State's "full sovereignty" or "unlimited sovereignty" in the entire air-space over State territory and territorial waters; for then the "right of innocent passage" could not be read in by interpretation, as it might be conceivably if the words "sovereignty" or "sovereign dominion" were allowed to stand alone.

Another course which has been suggested to Sir E. Grey as perhaps preferable, and upon which he would be glad to have the benefit of your opinion, is to avoid the use of either of the words "sovereignty" or "property," and to employ the term "jurisdiction" instead. Jurisdiction is no doubt, in one sense, one of the attributes of sovereignty, and it would therefore seem at first sight as if the arguments against the use of the word "sovereignty" must necessarily all apply to the use of the word "jurisdiction," but as the object in view is to assert the unfettered right of the Sovereign to legislate (subject, of course, to any treaties in force now or in the future) on the subject of air-vessels using the superincumbent air-space, it has been suggested that this right would be adequately asserted by a declaration to the effect that the superincumbent air-space above the territory and the territorial waters of a State is, and remains, subject to its exclusive jurisdiction.

The question whether the words "property," "sovereignty," "jurisdiction," or any one or more, and if so which, of them should be used in this connexion will also affect the draft suggestion for a possible Bill (Paper D) for the purpose of regulating aerial navigation in this country, in which it will no doubt be held desirable to introduce a preamble in similar terms to that proposed for the convention.

A letter from the Home Office (Paper E) is also enclosed, while the general attitude adopted by His Majesty's Government in regard to the draft convention may be seen from the accompanying despatch to the British delegates to the international conference (Paper F).

I am accordingly to request that you will be good enough to take the above observations and the accompanying papers into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey at your early convenience with your opinion as to—

1. Whether it is possible to claim for the State (1) as matter of public law, and (2) as matter of English municipal law (or "droit interne") the right of "property" over the air superincumbent upon its territories;

2. Whether, in any event, the term "sovereignty" used in this connexion would not confer on the State that absolute control over vessels navigating the air above its territories which His Majesty's Government consider to be indispensable.

Report.

In our opinion, the term "full and absolute sovereignty" would be the most desirable and advantageous term to employ in order to secure for the State absolute and undisputed control over vessels navigating the air above its territories. We prefer this phrase to the use of the word "property" when considering the rights of the State as a matter of international law; though the result is really the same, whichever expression is used.

FRANCE.—GENERAL.

As a matter of English municipal law the principle applies cujus est solum ejus est usque ad cælum, so that, theoretically, the rights of the private owner are as great in respect of the air-space above his land as over the surface of the land itself.

As regards the air-space superincumbent upon territorial waters, it is to be observed that the degree of control necessary to secure the safety of the State may well be greater than that required in reference to the use of the territorial waters themselves. And since the principle of State sovereignty involves the right of the State in relation to its own territories to exercise such powers as are necessary for the defence and security of its dominions, we think that jurisdiction over the air immediately surrounding the coasts, and for such a distance outwards as is necessary for the defence and security of the State, ought to be not less complete than that exercisable over the air-space which is actually above the territory of the State.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 3, 1911.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you herewith the papers, as noted in the accompanying list, respecting the position of British subjects who are inhabitants of a self-governing Dominion in the event of that Dominion withdrawing from or declining to adhere to a Commercial Treaty concluded by His Majesty's Government with a foreign Power.

2. In negotiating Commercial Conventions, it is now the custom of His Majesty's Government to provide in the Convention not only for the separate adherence, but also for the separate withdrawal of the different self-governing Dominions, on due notice being given. This is shown in the enclosed copy of the draft model Treaty (Paper A), on which all Commercial Conventions at present concluded between the United Kingdom and foreign Powers are, as far as possible, based. It will be seen that the privileges secured, such as the right to acquire property, or exemption from special taxation or from military service, are secured to "the subjects of each of the Contracting Parties," but that, by Article 20, "the stipulations of the present Treaty shall not be applicable to any of His Majesty's Colonies, &c., unless notice of adhesion shall have been given," most-favoured-nation treatment of colonial produce being however secured, so long as it is reciprocal. As, however, the Dominions are still bound by a number of older Conventions in which no provision is made for their separate withdrawal, His Majesty's Government have recently concluded with various countries special Agreements for the purpose of obtaining for the Dominions so bound this right of separate withdrawal.

3. On the Colombian Government, however, being approached with a view to enabling the Dominions to withdraw, if they so desired, from the Commercial Convention of 1866 between Great Britain and Colombia (Paper B), which also secured various rights to the subjects and citizens of the Contracting Parties, but contains no provision for the withdrawal of Colonies, the Colombian Government raised objections on the ground that, in the event of a self-governing Dominion withdrawing from the Treaty, the inhabitants thereof would still continue, in their capacity as British subjects, to enjoy the personal rights granted by the Treaty to British subjects generally, whereas Colombian citizens would enjoy no corresponding privileges in the territory of the non-adhering Dominion. Copy of the note from the Colombian Minister for Foreign Affairs setting forth these considerations is annexed hereto. (Paper C.)

4. The immediate objection of the Colombian Government might possibly have been met by His Majesty's Government making certain concessions which the Position of Colonial

British subjects as regards Commercial
Treaties.

Colombian Government appeared, from the Minister's note, to be anxious to obtain in the matter of the most-favoured-nation treatment provided for in the Convention, or else by arranging for the self-governing Dominions to withdraw in this and all future cases from those clauses only of Commercial Treaties which were commercial in character, as distinct from those which were political in character. The division would, however, in any case have presented difficulties, and it has been argued that it would not in fact be possible. However this may be, any such solution would have still left the status of colonial British subjects vague and unsettled in the event of the point being raised again at any time, as it is quite possible it will be, in the case of any of the Commercial Treaties concluded by His Majesty's Government to which the self-governing Dominions, or some of them, are not adherents. His Majesty's Government have decided, therefore, that it is advisable to come to a clear decision as regards the main question before making any further progress with the Colombian Treaty.

5. In 1899 your then predecessors in office were consulted as regards the status in Japan of British subjects who belonged to a self-governing Dominion which had not adhered to the Commercial Treaty concluded by Her Majesty's Government in 1894 with that country. The Treaty with Japan refers to the rights of the "subjects of the High Contracting Parties," and provides (Article XIX) that the stipulation of the Treaty shall not apply to India and certain Colonies except on notice of adhesion. The Law Officers reported (see Paper D) that, in their opinion, Article XIX had not the effect of limiting the rights of British subjects connected with non-adhering Colonies or possessions, and that the question who are British subjects for the purpose of the Treaty is one of British law. No test, they said, could be suggested for discrimination against persons connected with non-adhering Colonies, and Article XIX merely provided that the privileges and obligations of the Treaty should not ensure for the benefit of non-adhering Colonies—e.g., the produce of a non-adhering Colony would not be entitled to the Tariff prescribed by the Treaty. The discrimination of the Article was in fact, in their view, "territorial merely, and not personal," and they accordingly held that "all persons who by British law are recognised as possessing the rights of British citizenship all over the world are entitled to the benefits of its (i.e., the Commercial Treaty's) stipulations, and this test includes the inhabitants, being British subjects, of all Colonies and dependencies, whether they adhere to the Treaty or not." This opinion they confirmed in a subsequent Report furnished in the same year on a kindred point, arising out of the International Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property, to which certain Dominions had not adhered. This subsequent Report is likewise enclosed (Paper E), as well as the Circular despatch (Paper F), in which the substance of both these Reports was communicated to the Colonies.

6. It must be borne in mind, however, that the circumstances attending the conclusion of the Commercial Convention with Japan were somewhat exceptional. Great Britain undertook to renounce those rights of extra-territoriality which British subjects had till then enjoyed in Japan in exchange for the privileges accorded in the Convention, so that the inhabitants of a non-adhering Dominion were in danger, on being deprived of the rights of extra-territoriality which they had so far enjoyed, of not being able to benefit by the fresh privileges which were manifestly intended as substitutes for those which were resigned. It is possible, therefore, that the peculiar circumstances of the case may perhaps have, to a certain extent, influenced your predecessors in arriving at their decision in the case of Japan.

7. However that may be, neither Japan nor any other Power has, so far, advanced the contention that it is possible to draw a distinction between colonial British subjects and the inhabitants of the United Kingdom, though this may be possibly because no case involving the question has ever occurred. On the other hand, it has been pointed out to Sir E. Grey by the Secretary of State for the Colonies that the admission of this distinction would entail considerable practical difficulties in certain cases—e.g., if His Majesty's Government were compelled to differentiate between a Canadian and an Englishman both appealing in respect of the same grievance, or again, in the case of persons born in this country who emigrated to Australia, or in the case of Australians settled in this country. In neither of the latter cases would the change of domicile (in itself often a fact of considerable difficulty of proof) have effected any alteration in their status in the eyes of English law, but some test would clearly have to be devised whereby the moment of their change of status could be determined. I am to enclose herewith copy of a Memorandum drawn up in the Colonial Office which explains in detail the views held by the Secretary of State for the Colonies (Paper G).

8. In spite of the considerations therein set forth, Sir E. Grey is uncertain whether the decision taken in 1899 with regard to the Treaty with Japan should at the present time be applied generally in the case of all Commercial Treaties where no exceptional circumstances, such as those existing in the case of Japan, have to be taken into account.

9. He will be glad, therefore, to be informed whether you consider that an International Court of Arbitration would be likely to approve the contention that all persons who by British law are recognised as possessing the rights of British citizenship all over the world are entitled to the benefits accorded to British subjects eo nomine in Commercial Conventions concluded by His Majesty's Government, and that this test includes the inhabitants—being British subjects—of each of the Dominions and dependencies, whether such dominion or dependency has adhered to the Convention or not. If, on the other hand, you consider that this contention cannot be maintained, I am to request that you will state what, in your opinion, constitutes an inhabitant of a self-governing Dominion of the Empire, for the purposes of excluding him from rights and privileges accorded to British subjects by a Treaty to which the Dominion to which he belongs is not a party. Sir E. Grey will at the same time be glad to be furnished with any further observations which you may be good enough to offer on the subject generally.

Report.

That every individual who owes personal allegiance to the British Crown is a British subject, wherever he resides or whatever may be his domicile. His international status as a British subject cannot be affected by the adhesion, or non-adhesion, to any Treaty of the Dominion or dependency which he inhabits. All such persons are, therefore, entitled to the benefits accorded to British subjects eo nomine in any Treaty or Convention concluded by His Majesty's Government, unless the particular Treaty or Convention indicates an intention that they, or any class of them, should be excluded from the benefits conferred by it upon British subjects at large. The question whether in the case of any given Treaty or Convention such an intention is indicated must, of course, depend upon the construction to be placed upon the particular document.

In the case of a Treaty in the form of the draft model (Paper A), the Treaty—apart from Articles 20 and 21—includes within its scope all British subjects and all British territory. The only exceptions to the generality of the Treaty are those contained in Article 20 (for Article 21 is merely complementary to Article 20, and goes no further in principle). Article 20, whilst it excepts from the operation of the Treaty certain portions of British territory and the goods produced or manufactured therein, does not except any persons, and so leaves the Treaty applicable to all British subjects without distinction.

The result is that, in our opinion, an International Court of Arbitration, in construing a Treaty in the form of the draft model, would hold that all subjects of the British Crown, including British subjects inhabiting a non-adhering Dominion or dependency, are entitled to all the benefits accorded to British subjects eo nomine in such a Treaty.

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

*Foreign Office, August 10, 1911.*Detention of "Foam Queen" and "Arizona" under Foreign Enlistment
Act.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to enclose the papers noted in the accompanying list, which involve the consideration of whether two vessels, one the "Foam Queen," at present lying at Maxim's wharf, Erith, and another, the "Arizona," lying at Barrow, may be deemed to be in course of fitting out to proceed against the dominions of a friendly State within the meaning of section 11 of "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870."

On the 1st instant the Portuguese Minister at this Court left at this Office a communication he had received from a correspondent at Lewisham, and the Commissioners of His Majesty's Customs were at once asked to enquire into and report upon the matter (Paper A).

The report of their water-guard inspector (Paper B) disclosed certain suspicious circumstances with regard to the "Foam Queen," and the Commissioners were asked to keep a watch on her movements, and to inform Sir E. Grey of any fresh developments that might come to their knowledge.

On the afternoon of the 5th instant the Customs telephoned to this department the terms of two messages they had received from their collector at Barrow (Papers C and D), and desired to be advised as to the action which should, in the opinion of Sir E. Grey, be taken with respect to the "Arizona." As the matter was pressing and the circumstances were distinctly suspicious, the telegram (Paper E) was sent to the Commissioners of Customs, and their reply (Paper F) was received the same evening.

On the afternoon of the 8th instant Sir Nathaniel Highmore, the Solicitor of His Majesty's Customs, called at this Office and discussed the matter with the head of the department which deals with this correspondence and with the assistant legal adviser. He also left with them a copy of a letter (Paper C) which he had that day received from a Mr. Secretan, the managing director of the company which now owns both the "Arizona" and the "Foam Queen," and it was then made manifest, for the first time, that both these vessels were being prepared to proceed to Paraguay, and that a Mr. C. F. Mendl, who is a director of the Paraguay Central Railway Company, and has other interests in that republic, was acting as the representative of certain persons in Paraguay, who are advancing a sum of some 120,000*l.* to some Paraguayan citizens, for the purchase and dispatch of these two vessels, and of another named the "Salop," which had already cleared from the port of London with stores and provisions for the same destination.

It seemed desirable in these circumstances to hear Mr. Mendl's own account of the precise object of this enterprise, and he was accordingly invited to attend at this Office, which he did yesterday.

He explained that things were in a very unsettled state in the republic, that revolutions were easily organised, and that, in short, there was no stable Government, and that neither life nor property was safe. The persons who were financing the dispatch of these vessels were people whose commercial interests rendered it of paramount importance to them that peace should be introduced and preserved, and who believed that the presence of these ships would ensure the observance of law and order.

They were confident that the more respectable elements of the present and former Governments would combine on their arrival to oust the less respectable and would together form a stable Government, and that a more satisfactory state of things would then be established and maintained. The ships would be handed over to those parties on their arrival, and would become their property.

There is no reason to doubt that Mr. Mendl's statements were made in perfectly good faith, and that so far as he is concerned credence may be attached to them.

The latest information in the possession of His Majesty's Government with regard to the position in Paraguay is contained in a telegram from His Majesty's chargé d'affaires at Buenos Ayres, dated the 13th ultimo, in which he states that Colonel Jara has been compelled to resign, and has left the country. New provisional President has been elected. All passed quietly, and requirements of constitution were observed.

9

In reply to a question as to whether the present provisional President had any knowledge of the proposed dispatch of these vessels, Mr. Mendl replied that probably he had not, and that it would in no wise further matters, but the reverse, were His Majesty's Government to ask if he entertained any objection to their going out.

Such briefly are the facts of the case which are within the knowledge of this Office.

I am to enclose a book which contains a full report of the case of Regina v. Sandoval, Baird, and Call, in which the interpretation of section 11 of "The Foreign Enlistment Act of 1870" was very fully argued and discussed, and it was held by the late Justice A. L. Sraith and Mr. Justice Wills on pp. 86 and 90 that a full equipment, embracing both men and munitions of war, was not necessary to constitute an expedition within the meaning of section 11 of the Foreign Enlistment Act, but that any act which contributed in any material degree towards setting on foot an expedition fitted for warlike purposes, if done in this country, constituted an infraction of the section in question. No case appears to have arisen as to the precise meaning of the words "proceed against the dominions of a friendly State" in that section.

I am to request that you will take these papers into your consideration, and favour Sir Edward Grey at your earliest convenience with your opinion as to whether under all the circumstances warrants should be issued for the purpose of seizing and detaining the ships under section 23 of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and, if so, whether the terms of the draft warrants enclosed are fit and proper for the purpose.

Law Officers of the Crown to Colonial Office.—(Received at Foreign Office, November 23.)Royal Courts of Justice,October 25, 1911.

Sir,

Extradition for offences respecting diamond industry in Africa.

WE were honoured with your commands signified to us in Sir H. W. Just's letter of the 9th May last, stating that he was directed by you to forward to us, for our consideration, correspondence, as noted in the margin,* relative to a proposed supplementary extradition treaty between this country and Germany for the reciprocal surrender, as between British and German territories in South Africa, of persons guilty of offences in connection with the diamond industry.

That it would be observed that, as regards Southern Rhodesia and the South African Protectorates, no difficulty was apprehended in giving effect to the proposed extradition arrangement.

That the procedure to be adopted in respect of the Union of South Africa was, however, not entirely free from doubt, and that you desired to have our advice on the matter before approaching the Union Government on the subject.

That, as at present advised, you were inclined to the view, expressed in the Home Office letter of the 12th April, 1911, that the most suitable method of dealing with the situation would be (if the Union Government desired the conclusion of an extradition treaty with Germany), that the Union Government should pass an Act adding diamond offences to the list of extraditable crimes, as regards the territories of the Union; that an order in council should be passed under section 18 of the Extradition Act of 1870, directing that the new law should, within the Union of South Africa, have effect as if it were part of the Extradition Act; that the proposed extradition treaty should then be concluded; and that the order in council passed under section 2 of the Extradition Act of 1870, applying the Extradition Acts in respect of the new treaty to the Union of South Africa should apply those Acts, subject to the modification introduced.

That you would, however, be glad if we would take the papers into our consideration, and advise—

1. Whether the procedure proposed was, in our opinion, the proper procedure to be adopted in the circumstances of the case;
2. If not, what means should be adopted to attain the object in view;
3. Generally upon the questions raised in the correspondence.

We have taken the papers into our consideration, and, in obedience to your commands, have the honour to

Report—

1. That, in our opinion, the procedure proposed with reference to the Union of South Africa cannot be adopted in the circumstances of this case. The offences to be dealt with include many which are altogether outside the scope of the Imperial Extradition Acts, and cannot be brought within their scope save by the action of the Imperial Legislature.

2. That the object in view might be attained—

(a.) By amending the Imperial Act or by passing a new Act like that of 1906 (6 Ed. VII, cap. 15), adding offences against the diamond laws to the list of extradition crimes; or

* Colonial Office to Home Office, February 13; Home Office, March 3; to Home Office, March 17, 1911; Memorandum; Home Office, April 12, 1911; Canadian Extradition Act.

GERMANY.—PACIFIC ISLANDS.

- (b.) By passing an Act in the Union Parliament on the lines of the Canadian Act, cap. 155 of the revised Statutes, 1906, with its own list of extradition crimes, and also making provision for carrying into effect, in the Union territories, the surrender of fugitive criminals, as defined by the Imperial Act, the operation of which, in the Union, could then be suspended by order in council.

The effect of adopting course (b) would be, that persons in custody under the Act would only be lawfully in custody while within the territory of the Union itself, and, therefore, unless this difficulty is negligible in practice, course (a) is the proper course to adopt. If the difficulty is negligible in practice the choice between (a) and (b) is a question of policy merely.

3. That as to the South African Protectorates, the existing Imperial Extradition Acts cannot be applied to these, as they are not "British possessions." The protectorate ordinances have no extra-territorial effect. There is, therefore, no provision for the conveyance in custody of a prisoner beyond the territory of the protectorate. It seems to us to be eminently desirable that, if, as suggested by us in (2), Imperial legislation is resorted to, power should be taken to apply the Extradition Acts to protectorates.

[Case No. 608/10.]

[April 18, 1911.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, June 2, 1910.

I AM directed by the Earl of Crewe to transmit to you the accompanying despatches from the High Commissioner for the Western Pacific, forwarding the draft of a joint Regulation* to provide for the control of the recruitment and employment of native labourers in the New Hebrides.

2. I am also to enclose the drafts of two despatches in reply which Lord Crewe has had under consideration to address to Sir E. im Thurn, together with a copy of the Order in Council of the 2nd November, 1907, relating to the New Hebrides, to which are scheduled the Anglo-French Convention of the 20th October, 1906, and the notes exchanged on the 29th August, 1907, between His Majesty's Government and the Government of the French Republic.

3. The draft Regulation is intended to be made under the powers conferred by Article VII of the Convention "to issue jointly, for the peace, order, and good government of the group, as well as for the execution of the measures resulting from the present Convention, local Regulations binding on all the inhabitants of the group."

4. Lord Crewe apprehends that if there is any conflict between such Regulations and the provisions of the Convention the latter must prevail, but it does not seem unreasonable to conclude that the Regulations may amplify the Convention provided they are not contrary to it, and may in certain cases create offences or deal with matters not specifically dealt with by the Convention.

5. In regard to the subject-matter of the joint Regulation, of which a draft is now forwarded, elaborate provision is made by the Convention in Articles XXXI-LVI inclusive, and the question arises whether any provisions of the draft Regulation (as it would be modified by the draft despatch from the Secretary of State) would be invalid, as being in conflict with the Convention. You will observe that the question is raised by the High Commissioner in the fourth and fifth paragraphs of his despatch of the 5th January last.

6. In particular Lord Crewe desires me to direct your attention to the following sections of the draft Regulation:—

(a.) Section 4 ("Forfeiture of Deposit"): Compare Article XXXI (2) of the Convention. This provision appears to carry out the spirit of the Convention, and it is presumed that it is legally valid.

(b.) Section 5 ("Power of Resident Commissioner to refuse or cancel Licences"): Compare Articles XXXI and LVI (4) of the Convention. Lord Crewe apprehends that the power to issue a licence carries with it the power to refuse at discretion; but he feels some doubt in regard to the general power to revoke or suspend licences during their currency.

(c.) Section 7 ("Engagement of Females and Boys prohibited"): Compare Article XXXIII of the Convention. It has been argued that, though the restrictions imposed by this Article on the engagement of females and boys cannot be diminished, they may be increased by a joint Regulation—on the ground that such action is not contrary to the Convention but is merely carrying further the policy initiated by it—inasmuch as previous to the Convention there were no legal restrictions on such engagements, at least so far as British subjects were concerned. In other words, the Convention confers, according to this view, no right, but restricts a pre-existing liberty, which may be diminished still further without running counter to the spirit of the Convention.

(d.) "Conditions to be endorsed on Licences to recruit Native Labourers in the New Hebrides" (annexed to the draft Regulation). As the issue of licences appears to be in the absolute discretion of the representatives of the two Powers, Lord Crewe desires that it may be made clear whether, as a condition of the issue of such licences, the licences may be required to perform certain acts not prescribed by law, or to refrain from performing certain acts legally permissible as may seem fit to the issuing authority.

7. A different question arises with regard to the method of making the provisions of the draft Regulation legally binding on British subjects alone.

8. A joint Regulation under Article VII of the Convention must of course be acceptable to both the British and French authorities, and it is possible that some provisions of the draft Regulation now under consideration may not meet with the approval of the French Government. In that case it would in some cases be convenient that they should be made binding on British subjects alone, by means of a King's Regulation under Article 108 of "The Pacific Order in Council, 1893" (of which a copy is enclosed for convenience of reference). As is explained in the draft Confidential despatch to the High Commissioner which is transmitted herewith, Lord Crewe is advised that there is no legal objection to this course, provided that such a King's Regulation contains nothing contrary to the Convention; and he would be glad to learn whether you concur in this view, which appears to be borne out in particular by Article 9 of the Order in Council of the 2nd November, 1907, relating to the New Hebrides.

9. I am accordingly to request that you will take the papers into your consideration and report—

(1.) Whether there are any provisions in the draft Regulations (with the suggested modifications) which are invalid on the grounds of repugnancy to the terms of the Anglo-French Convention of the 20th October, 1906, as amended by the notes exchanged on the 29th August, 1907, or on other grounds; and, if so, what sections?

(2.) Whether it is still competent for the High Commissioner under "The Pacific Order in Council, 1893," to make King's Regulations binding on British subjects in the New Hebrides both concerning the recruiting and employment of natives within the group and concerning other matters, such Regulations not being inconsistent with the Convention.

(3.) Generally.

[15433 and 16985.]

(Case No. 608/11.)

Report.

(1.) In our opinion the under-mentioned provisions of the draft Regulation conflict in the manner indicated with the Anglo-French Convention of the 20th October, 1906, and are consequently invalid:—

(a) and (b). The provisions of section 4 of the draft Regulation relating to the forfeiture of the deposit of 80*l.* and those of section 5 enabling the Resident Commissioner to refuse to issue licences and to revoke or suspend them conflict with the provisions of Articles VII, XXXI, and LVI. Article XXXI is expressed in language which more aptly describes a duty to issue licences than a discretionary power to do so, and the provisions of Article LVI make it clear that there is no power to suspend or revoke a licence at discretion, for even in the event of a conviction on a serious charge or for a second offence it gives a power of suspension only, and that for not more than two years. This Article disposes of any ambiguity there might be in Article XXXI, and points to there being no discretion to refuse to issue a licence. This being so, such a discretion cannot be given by the Regulation, and clause 5 of the draft Regulation is therefore void. As to the forfeiture of the deposit: Assuming that there had been a discretion as to the issue of the licence, any terms which might be thought desirable could have been imposed. But there being, as we have said, no such discretionary power, the provision as to forfeiture of the deposit becomes in effect the attempted imposition of a penalty, and by virtue of Article VII of the Convention the maximum penalty which can be imposed for the enforcement of any Regulation is 20*l.* The true view is that the deposit is, as Article XXXI calls it, a "security"—that is to say, a fund which is there to answer penalties or expenses of repatriation, and the like.

(c.) It is doubtful whether the provisions of section 7 of the draft Regulation forbidding the engagement of female natives are valid in view of the language of Article XXXIII of the Convention, which contemplates that women may be engaged subject to the consents therein mentioned being obtained.

(d.) The same considerations as are referred to in (a), (b), and (c) above apply to clauses 4 and 11 of the proposed conditions of licences, and these conditions cannot be imposed.

(e.) Section 19 of the draft Regulation appears to cover the transfer of a contract of engagement from a British subject to a French subject, or vice versa, with the consent of the British Resident Commissioner alone. Article XLIII (2) of the Convention (assuming that "or" is a mistake for "and") requires the joint authority of British and French Resident Commissioners.

(f.) Section 22 of the draft Regulation concludes with a proviso that the labourer is to be made clearly to understand that repatriation is not compulsory. It appears to us that Article LI makes repatriation compulsory, and Sir E. im Thurn, in paragraph 8 of his despatch of the 5th January, 1910, emphasises the importance of such a provision.

(g.) Section 33 of the draft Regulation in its first paragraph requires wages to be paid in cash; yet in its second paragraph it appears to contemplate deductions from wages to pay for articles purchased from the employer, and this in effect involves payment of wages in kind. We think it doubtful whether this second paragraph can be reconciled with Article XLVI of the Convention.

(h.) The provisions of section 36 of the draft Regulation as it stands at present are in conflict with Article XXVI of the Convention, and are to that extent void. We observe that in paragraph 24 of the draft despatch it is proposed to substitute the analogous provisions of the draft Solomon Islands Regulation. We are unaware of the effect of the Regulation which it is proposed to substitute, and cannot therefore say whether or not it is open to the same objection as section 36.

(2.) Yes.

(3.) The Convention has been given the force of law by the New Hebrides Order in Council of the 2nd November, 1907, which enacts that the provisions of the Order itself and of all laws and regulations made under it shall be read and construed subject to the Convention. "The Pacific Order in Council, 1893," is also applied to the New Hebrides, subject to the Convention.

If, therefore, it is desired to restrict or alter, so far as British subjects are concerned, the rights and liberties which they possess under the Convention, this

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 10, 1911.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to submit to you, for your consideration, the papers noted in the accompanying list relative to the case of the steam-ship "Woodburn," a British merchant-vessel, which was fired upon when leaving Hurppu, in the Gulf of Finland, on the 3rd (16th) June, 1909, by vessels belonging to a Russian squadron, forming an escort to the Imperial yacht "Standart."

"Woodburn" fired escort of "Standart."

Claim for indemnity.

His Majesty's Government were informed of this incident in a telegram addressed to them on the 18th June, 1909, by the North of England Protecting and Indemnity Association (Paper A). This telegram, which was confirmed by a letter from the Association, dated the 18th June (Paper B), stated the bare facts of the case as received by cable from the captain of the vessel, namely, that a Russian torpedo-boat had fired on the ship while leaving port, carrying away her deck steam-pipes and holing her bulwarks and stokehole casing, that the fireman Coyne had been shot in the leg and sent to Viborg Hospital, and that the ship was proceeding as soon as her steam-pipes were repaired. The Association further asked that His Majesty's Government would cause His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg to make the necessary enquiries and representations to ensure indemnity to the shipowners and to the injured man.

The sworn statements of the master and crew of the steam-ship "Woodburn" (Paper C) constitute the greater part of the evidence provided by the shipowners in support of their claim for indemnity. Of these, the statement of Robertson, the master of the ship, is the fullest. According to this statement, the steam-ship "Woodburn" arrived at Hurppu on the 10th June. When she passed into Hurppu there were no signs of any Russian vessels, and the master of the ship had no information that any were expected, nor did the pilot who brought the "Woodburn" into Hurppu mention the approaching visit of the Russian squadron. On the 14th June the Chief of Police visited the "Woodburn" while at Hurppu, but gave no information or instructions as to navigation of the channel, and said nothing as to the existence of any special regulations. The crew of the "Woodburn" could, however, now see the Imperial yacht, and there were torpedo-boats in harbour with them. The "Woodburn" left Hurppu for the Tyne on the 16th June, after taking two pilots on board. The master had then no knowledge as to their course, nor as to any manœuvres necessitated by the presence of the Russian squadron. The course taken by the pilot brought the vessel between a guardship, which lay on her starboard side, and a torpedo-boat which lay on her port side, these vessels forming part of the escort to the Imperial yacht. The pilot's object was to steer between these two vessels, thereby passing through the ring of ships escorting the Imperial yacht. However, a torpedo-boat which appeared to be manœuvring between these two vessels drew up along the starboard side of the "Woodburn," and from this torpedo-boat some instructions were shouted through a megaphone in a language which the master of the ship took to be Russian; neither he nor the pilot, however, understood the language nor the instructions given. The same torpedo-boat then ran across on to the port bow of the "Woodburn" and fired a blank shot which, after swinging round, she followed up with a second blank shot. The master of the "Woodburn" states that immediately he heard the first gun he ordered "full speed astern," and that the order was at once obeyed from the engine-room. The effect of thus reversing the engines was to throw the head of the vessel to starboard, which put her into such a position that she was heading with the Imperial yacht a little on her port bow. When the "Woodburn" was in this position a live shell was fired which struck the vessel, inflicting the damage already described. The master states that he fails to understand why the live shell was fired, as it was plain to anyone understanding navigation that he was manœuvring to keep clear of the vessels. A second live shell was fired, but he could not ascertain from which of the torpedo-boats; this shell did not strike the "Woodburn." The damage sustained by the ship then obliged her to come to a standstill, and the master let go his port anchor.

The master's statement proceeds to relate how the Chief Inspector of Police, who came on board the "Woodburn," asked why the "Woodburn" had proceeded on this course. He replied to this official that the pilot had led him to understand that there was neither sufficient room nor sufficient water to pass between the torpedo-boats and the shore. The Chief Inspector stated that he should have followed the same course as when entering Hurppu; the master replied that he had done so, proceeding in and out by the same channel. The master further told the Chief Inspector that the pilot had given him to understand that there was not sufficient water to pass between the torpedo boats and the shore. The Chief Inspector of Pilots for the Viborg district, the Chief of Finnish Pilots, and another officer then came on board the "Woodburn" and inspected the damage done. The wounded fireman received medical treatment and was conveyed to Viborg Hospital. Other Russian officials came on board in the course of the same evening. The "Woodburn" proceeded on her way the following day under the charge of the Chief of the Viborg District Pilots, having carried out her own repairs in a temporary fashion, and not having received assistance which had been promised her when the vessel was inspected.

The master states that, on proceeding on his way on the 17th June, he noticed that, owing to a change of wind, the torpedo-boats at anchor round the Imperial yacht had swung round so that, though their anchors were in the same places, they now left the proper channel open to his vessel.

He adds that he cannot understand why his vessel was fired at, seeing that when the first blank shell was fired he manoeuvred to steer clear of the fleet, and that it should have been plain that such a manoeuvre with such a vessel would necessitate a slight touch-ahead in order to keep the vessel in position before she could turn. In his anxiety to take the way off the vessel as quickly as possible, he took charge of the vessel himself at this moment as the pilots did not appear to understand the urgency of the case.

As master of the vessel, Robertson complains that he was unaware of any of the regulations governing such cases; that he was not informed of these regulations at any of the Finnish ports; that, although he passed within 50 yards of the guardship, he had no warning from that vessel; and that the only warning given him was the instruction imparted from the torpedo-boat through the megaphone, which instruction was unintelligible, both to himself and to the pilots. He further expresses his opinion that the Russian vessels had anchored without considering the possibility of a change of wind, which would make their vessels lie at anchor in such a way that the regulations (of which, however, he had no knowledge) would be inoperative, as there would not be water enough between the squadron and the shore to allow a vessel with the draught of the "Woodburn" to pass that way. On the other hand, on coming out with the wind blowing from the north-east, the vessels had swung round on their anchors, and left sufficient room. He states that even after the change of wind, his vessel was forced to pass very close to the anchors of the torpedo craft in order to find sufficient water.

The above statement of the master of the ship, which has been given at length, is endorsed by Davison, chief mate of the "Woodburn." Davison states that when the vessel was struck by the live shell, she was heading more or less in the direction of the Imperial yacht. Arthur Moffat, second mate, whose statement also endorses that of the master, states that when the second and third blank shots were fired the vessel was forging ahead slowly. He agrees that at one time the "Woodburn," which was swinging round, must have headed straight towards the Imperial yacht, but states that they were never within half-a-mile of her. The statement of the steward confirms those already mentioned. The chief engineer, whose statement is also in agreement with the others, mentions that the captain informed the Chief Inspector of Police that his vessel was drawing 12 feet going in, and 20 feet coming out of Hurppu, and that he was at the time acting under the directions of the pilots. Howston, the second engineer, who was on duty at the time, states that the moment the first blank shot was fired he received, and obeyed, the order full speed astern. He adds, that with the very quick reversing gear possessed by the "Woodburn" it would not be as much as 5 seconds from the time the order was received until the engines were reversing. The fireman Coyne states that he received a wound which was three-cornered in shape, and of such a size that he could put his finger-end into it. While in hospital he received a personal gift of 200 roubles from His Imperial Majesty the Czar.

In Paper C will also be found the logs of the chief engineer and chief officer.

In Paper D it will be seen that the fireman Coyne admits that the "Woodburn" was "erroneously" steering between the men-of-war.

With regard to the question as to the regulations to be observed by vessels approaching Russian squadrons at anchor, it was stated (Paper E) in the House of Commons by Mr. McKinnon Wood, in reply to a question asked by Major Anstruther-Gray, that according to these regulations "all vessels must pass between the shore and the squadron, and not through the squadron." An enclosure in Paper F gives these regulations in full. They were published by the Board of Trade in their "Notes to Mariners" (p. 78. 1st January. Baltic); they are as follows:—

"Russian waters: Caution. The following additional regulations for merchant-vessels meeting men-of-war in Russian waters have been published by the Russian Government.

"All vessels arriving at any anchorage, bay, or entry to a strait, where a squadron is at anchor, or a searchlight in operation, must obey all the directions given and signals made by the guard-ship. When entrance is prohibited three globes by day or three red lights vertical at night are shown from the guard-ship. When entrance is allowed under instructions she will hoist the special flag, blue with white stripes by day or three white lights at night. If a gun is fired the vessel should be at once stopped and await instructions. If no signal is made vessels may enter but must not pass between the anchored ships, but between the shore and the ship nearest the shore. Vessels not conforming to these rules will be fired on.

"Ships approaching Squadrons.—When the leading ship of a squadron shows a signal according to international agreement, and three globes by day or three red lights and the searchlight at night, all vessels must instantly steer clear and keep out of the course of the squadron. Should a vessel disobey this rule a blank shot will be fired, and if this warning is neglected she will be fired upon."

These regulations were inserted in the monthly editions of the "Notices to Mariners" for 1st October, 1908, and in the six succeeding monthly editions until that of 1st April, 1909, inclusive, after which date (in accordance with the usual practice) the regulations were omitted.

The Board of Trade, however, state (Paper F) that the master of the "Woodburn" received a copy of the "Notices to Mariners" containing the regulations at the commencement of his voyage.

From Paper G it will be seen that it has been ascertained that the incident took place in Russian territorial waters and that no question of the high seas is involved.

The Finnish pilot in his account (Paper H) states that the course actually taken between the torpedo-boat and the guard ship was the "only way possible in view of the narrowness of the course and the depth of the vessel." This account declares that no warning was given that this course was contrary to regulations; that no importance was attached to the manoeuvres of the torpedo-boat, which left the way free to the "Woodburn"; that the firing began without any signal; and that the shots were in such rapid succession that it was impossible to say which shot was intended as a warning. In other respects the account tallies with those already quoted, but it further states that the Russians declared that the shots were fired because the bow of the "Woodburn" had been turned towards the Imperial yacht.

The account drawn up by the Finnish Pilot Administration, and published in the Russian press (Paper J), bears out the pilot's statements, adding that the captain of the "Woodburn" could not make himself understood by the pilot, except for a few words of command; that the pilot was obliged to steer between the vessels owing to reefs and shallows on the land side; that he knew that it was contrary to regulations to steer within the ring of ships surrounding the yacht, but that he had reasons for believing that the ships lay outside the ring; that pilots had orders to steer steamers of deep draught unconditionally through the middle of the channel; and that he did not know that the order to keep outside the ring affected foreign merchant-vessels of such deep draught as the "Woodburn."

On the 10th October, 1909, His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg reported (Paper K) that the Chief of the Lloyd's Station at Viborg had been reprimanded for not having taken sufficient steps to make the pilots under his jurisdiction acquainted with the regulations, and that the pilot who had steered the "Woodburn" had been placed under arrest.

The view of the incident held by the Russian Government differs somewhat from that of the shipowners. Paper L gives the note of the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs summarising the reports furnished by the Russian naval officers concerned. It will be seen from this, firstly, that the Russian naval officers held that the pilot understood the signal given through the megaphone; secondly, that the "Woodburn" did not change her course after the first shot; thirdly, that the "Woodburn" only turned to starboard after the live shell was fired, and that up till then she was heading for the middle of the Imperial yacht. (The English account states that the engines were reversed after the first blank shot, and that the vessel's head was consequently turned to starboard, leaving the Imperial yacht on her port bow.) This report makes no mention of the change of wind. It further states that outside the "line of protection" the water was 8 or 9 "sagènes" (i.e., between 56 and 63 feet) deep, that no record was kept of the time which elapsed between the firing of the first blank shot and the discharge of the live shells, and that the instruction shouted through the megaphone was in the Swedish, and not the Russian, language. Paper M shows that the Russian Government consider that the "Woodburn" continued her course in spite of the warning given through the megaphone and the blank shots, and that the live shots were fired because it was seen that she was heading towards the Imperial yacht. In Paper N it is mentioned that the Ministry for Foreign Affairs regard the action of the pilot as inexplicable; while Paper O contains a supplementary note from M. Isvolsky concerning the case, in which the Russian Government state that the "Woodburn" was acting in a manner contrary to the Regulations quoted above for ships approaching a Russian squadron.

Before any action was taken by His Majesty's Government with a view to obtaining from the Russian Government the indemnity demanded by the North of England Protecting and Indemnity Association, the case was submitted to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and to the Board of Trade for their opinions. Paper P gives the opinion of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty. Their Lordships observe that the signals which, according to the Regulations quoted above, should be shown to ships to indicate whether they may or may not approach a Russian squadron at anchor, were not shown. They consider that the action of the Russian naval officers was hasty in the extreme, and emphasise the fact that, as a duly qualified pilot was on board the "Woodburn," the responsibility for the safe navigation of the ship, as well as for compliance with national and local Regulations, would rest with him, and not with the captain. They state their opinion that the owners have a valid claim for compensation.

The views expressed by the Board of Trade will be found in Paper F, which contains a short Memorandum by the Professional Member of the Marine Department. This Memorandum agrees with the view held by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Board of Trade state their opinion that the owners have a prima facie case against the Russian Government.

Correspondence then ensued between this Department, the Board of Trade, and the North of England Protecting and Indemnity Association with a view to the settlement of the claim to be presented to the Russian Government (Papers Q, R, S, T, U).

The amount of the claim was ultimately fixed at 727l. 5s. 2d.

The claim, together with the documents, vouchers, and affidavits was forwarded by His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg to the Minister for Foreign Affairs in a private letter, together with a pro-memoria, on the 3rd February, 1910 (Paper V). In this pro-memoria were set forth the facts of the case in a summarised form. The reply of the Russian Government to this claim was received by His Majesty's Ambassador in October of last year. The reply (Paper W) stated that the Russian Government, after enquiry into the matter, had decided that the action taken by their naval officers was in entire conformity with the existing Regulations. The Russian Government suggested, however, that if the owners consider the pilot responsible, an action could be brought by them against him for recovery of damages.

In view of this refusal on the part of the Russian Government to grant compensation, and of the opinions already expressed by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and the Board of Trade that the case of the owners of the "Woodburn" is a fair one, I am directed to request that you will be so good as to take the enclosed papers into your consideration, and to furnish Sir E. Grey with your opinion—

(1.) Whether in the circumstances His Majesty's Government are now justified in requesting the Russian Government to submit the case to arbitration.

(2.) If the answer to the previous question be in the affirmative, on what special grounds can such a request be most advantageously supported.

(3.) Sir Edward Grey would also be glad to receive any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer on the case.

I have, &c.

(1) and (2). In our opinion, the chances of success in an arbitration upon this claim are so remote that we do not advise His Majesty's Government to request the Russian Government to submit the case to arbitration. Even if the facts, as stated by the officers of the "Woodburn," are accepted, we are of opinion that the tribunal would hold that the Russian officers had not so acted as to make the Russian Government liable to make compensation.

If the facts as stated by the Russian authorities are accepted, it is clear that the claim must fail.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 28, 1911.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit to you herewith papers, as noted in the accompanying list, respecting the claim of the Russian Government to treat Miss Kate Malecka as a Russian subject in Russia.

Miss Malecka's father, Dr. John Paul Malecki, a Pole by race, was born in the Russian Empire, a Russian subject, emigrated to England and settled there, and was granted a certificate of British naturalisation on the 3rd May, 1860 (Paper A). The same year, but subsequent to his naturalisation, Dr. Malecki married, in St. Jude's Church, Southwark, a British subject, and their daughter Kate was born in the United Kingdom in 1868.

Miss Kate Malecka continued to reside in this country till about two years ago, as a Russian

when she went to live in Warsaw. She was then the bearer of a British passport, which appears to have been accepted without question at the time by the Russian authorities.

After the arrest of Miss Malecka on the 5th April last on a charge of conspiring against the Russian Government, which was the outcome of her connection with the Polish Socialist party, His Majesty's consul at Warsaw obtained the opinion of a leading lawyer of that place on the question of her nationality in Russia. This opinion (Paper B) was to the effect that by the laws of Poland, Dr. Malecki lost his Russian nationality when he emigrated, and that his daughter was therefore not a Russian subject in Russia in contemplation of Russian law. Opinions to the same effect were subsequently obtained from the legal adviser to His Majesty's Embassy at St. Petersburg (Papers C and D).

On the strength of these opinions, His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg, by Sir E. Grey's instructions, addressed a note to the Russian Government (Paper E), claiming Miss Malecka as a British subject in Russia.

To this the Russian Government replied (Paper F), pointing out that articles 325 and 326 of the Russian Criminal Code were made applicable to the Polish provinces by an Imperial ukase in 1850, and that, as neither Dr. Malecki nor his daughter had obtained the permission to renounce their Russian nationality which those articles prescribe, both must be regarded as Russian subjects in Russia. The Russian note further observed that this deduction was in conformity with the British ^{Naturalisation} Law of 1870.

Article 326 of the code, referred to but not quoted in the Russian note, runs, in translation, as follows:—

“Whoever absenting himself from the fatherland does not return to it upon being invited to do so by the Government is equally liable for the infraction to the loss of all civil rights and to perpetual banishment from the Empire, if within the term fixed at the option of the court he does not show that he has been impelled by circumstances independent of his will, or, at the least, extenuating circumstances. Up to that moment he is considered as absent, disappeared from his domicile, and his property is placed under guardianship, according to the regulations established to this effect by the civil laws.”

The effect of these articles and of the Russian views as to loss of Russian nationality have been the subject of much diplomatic discussion between Russia and the United States of America, as large numbers of Russian subjects, who have left Russia and become naturalised in the United States of America, have subsequently returned to Russia, and been tried for breach of the above laws. The United States Government have usually made remonstrances on their behalf. An account of these cases may be found in “Moore's Digest of International Law” (vol. iii. pp. 622-656).

It appears to be clear from a perusal of these cases that “loss of civil rights” in the relevant articles of the Criminal Code does not mean “loss of nationality,” and also that, whether it means loss of nationality or not, the consequence only follows where it is imposed by a criminal court, and does not follow automatically merely because the individual concerned has emigrated, and been naturalised without the consent of the Russian Government.

It may therefore be argued that these articles do not apply to Miss Malecka's father, and afford no ground for contending that he had lost his Russian nationality.

On the other hand, if Miss Malecka possesses both British and Russian nationality her Russian nationality must prevail in Russia, and His Majesty's Government have no right to claim to treat her there as a British subject.

The legal adviser to His Majesty's Embassy at St. Petersburg and the lawyer consulted by His Majesty's consul at Warsaw both considered that the effect of article 17 of the Polish code was that Dr. Malecki, the father, lost his Russian nationality on his naturalisation in Great Britain, and that Miss Malecka, the daughter, was in consequence only British by nationality, and had not inherited Russian nationality from her father.

The Russian note admits the existence of this special provision applicable to natives of Poland, but maintains that the subsequent extension of the Criminal Code to Poland and the introduction of the machinery for granting emigration passports to residents in the Polish provinces show that article 17 of the Civil Code applies only where there has been permission by the Government authorities to renounce Russian nationality.

The effect of this contention would, of course, be that Dr. Malecki remained a Russian subject despite his naturalisation, because no such permission was obtained.

Sir E. Grey would be glad if you would take the papers enclosed into your consideration, and furnish him with your opinion whether, under all the circumstances, he would be justified in continuing to claim that Miss Malecka should be treated as a British subject when within the limits of the Russian Empire.

I am, &c.

Report.

[42225]

We understand that what we are asked to advise upon is the question whether the claim that Miss Malecka should be treated as a British subject when within the limits of the Russian Empire could be substantiated if brought before a legal tribunal. The answer to this question depends not upon British law or international law, but upon the law of Russia, and it is difficult, therefore, for us to express a very confident opinion upon the subject. We have, however, considered the arguments adduced on the one side by the Russian Ministry of Justice and on the other by M. Scheftel, and have arrived at the following conclusions:—

The case turns upon the question whether Dr. Malecki, in the view of the Russian law, did or did not retain his Russian nationality in spite of his naturalisation in this country.

Assuming that Dr. Malecki was subject to the Civil Code of Poland (which is by no means clear in view of his description of himself as “a subject of Russia in the province of Wolhynia”), and that article 17 of that code refers to loss of nationality as distinguished from loss of civil rights, it still remains to be considered whether under that article Russian nationality ceases ipso facto upon naturalisation abroad, or whether that consequence follows only when naturalisation has been effected in a way permitted by the Russian law. It appears clear that both by the general law of Russia, as represented by section 325 of the Criminal Code, and by the special provisions applicable to Poland, it is a punishable offence for a Russian subject to become naturalised abroad without the permission of his Government, and the argument of the Russian Ministry of Justice is to the effect that the fact that unauthorised naturalisation amounts in Russian law to a criminal offence shows that it cannot be recognised by that law as valid to effect a change in status. This argument is, in our view upon the materials before us, a sound one, and we have therefore arrived at the conclusion that, according to Russian law, Dr. Malecki would be held to have retained his Russian nationality, notwithstanding his naturalisation here. If he did retain his Russian nationality, it follows that Miss Malecka, notwithstanding that she is undoubtedly a British subject in the view of British law, is also a Russian subject in the view of the Russian law, and, consequently, that the claim that she should be treated as a British subject when within the Russian Empire is not maintainable.

I HAVE the honour to enclose the draft of an Order in Council for giving effect to a Treaty of Extradition concluded on the 4th March, 1911, between the United Kingdom and Siam, of which the ratifications were exchanged at London on the 1st August last.

The various departments of His Majesty's Government which are interested in the matter have concurred in the terms of the draft Order in Council, and I am now to enquire whether, in your opinion, it may properly be submitted to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

during war.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, October 5, 1911.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you herewith, in view of the sudden outbreak of hostilities between Italy and Turkey, papers, as noted in the accompanying list, respecting the temporary employment of British subjects in the service of His Majesty's Government by the Turkish Government in the matter of naval construction.

2. I am to explain that the former of the two questions mentioned in the Foreign Office minute (Enclosure A), viz., whether the obligation to cease service applies to the British subjects employed by the Turkish Government ashore and in civilian capacities in that Government's naval establishments has been settled, as will be seen from Enclosure B (Sir G. Lowther's No. 221, Telegraphic, and Sir E. Grey's reply), in the sense that they may remain in Turkish employ provided that they take no part in hostilities.

3. With regard to the second point raised in the Foreign Office minute, it will be seen from the third paragraph of the undated letter from the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty (Enclosure C (1)) that an offer was made to appoint, if so desired by the Turkish authorities, an overseer to supervise the construction of the ships ordered by the Turkish Government from the Armstrong, Vickers, and Brown Syndicate. This offer was communicated by Sir E. Grey to the Turkish Ambassador (Enclosure C (2)), and accepted by the latter in a note specifying the desires of his Government in this respect (Enclosure C (3)). The Turkish Ambassador's note was communicated to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty (Enclosure C (4)), and on the 23rd September the latter replied notifying the names of the officers detailed for the work in question. It will be seen (Enclosure C (5)) that an assistant constructor and two naval engineer captains were selected, and that the names and numbers of their subordinate staff were left for future determination. The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have now raised the question whether they should proceed with this arrangement in view of the state of war existing between Italy and Turkey.

4. I am to request that you will be good enough to take this question into your consideration at your earliest convenience, and will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion whether, in the present circumstances, His Majesty's Government should during the continuance of the present hostilities decline to permit the services of these officers to be utilised by the Turkish Government for the purpose of supervising the construction of the Turkish battle-ships.

Report.

That, in our opinion, it cannot be a breach of neutrality for His Majesty's Government to permit the services of the officers in question to be utilised by the Turkish Government for the purpose of supervising the construction in this country of Turkish battle-ships, since such ships will not be allowed to leave this country until the present hostilities are at an end. We may point out that no argument to the contrary could gain any support from the language of "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870," for, assuming that Messrs. Armstrong, Vickers, and Brown have complied with the provisions of section 8 of that Act, the shipbuilding operations, in the supervision of which these officers are employed, are themselves permitted by the Foreign Enlistment Act.

With regard to the further question put to us in Mr. Mallet's letter of the 13th instant, there is, in our opinion, no objection to allowing British officers who were in Turkish employment at the outbreak of hostilities to continue at their posts, on the understanding that they take no part in hostilities and that their present services are not calculated to assist the belligerent in the present war.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 15, 1911.

As to Canada being a "foreign country" in relation to Treaty of 1815 with United States.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you herewith the papers, as noted in the accompanying list, respecting the meaning of Article 2 of the Convention of Commerce between Great Britain and the United States of America, signed at London the 3rd July, 1815.

It will be observed (Paper B) that Mr. Bryce, His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington, maintains that a request, based on the most-favoured-nation clause in that Treaty, to have the same fiscal treatment accorded to His Majesty's Government by the United States as is given to Canada under the Reciprocity Agreement, would be met by the express words of the Treaty of 1815, which present no ground for the application of the clause where the benefits are given to Canada because Canada is not a foreign country, and because the last paragraph of Article 2 of that Treaty excepts from the provisions of that article the intercourse between the United States and the British possessions in North America.

On the other hand, it may be contended that, strictly speaking, the United Kingdom is entitled to claim the same fiscal treatment as is accorded to Canada by the present Agreement between Canada and the United States, because the United States are bound not to impose higher or other duties on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, than are or shall be payable on the like subjects, being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country; and because, in relation to the United States, Canada is a foreign country, and not a possession or colony of the United States.

With regard to the latter part of Mr. Bryce's statement that the express words of the Treaty of 1815 present no ground for the application of the most-favoured-nation clause where the benefits are given to Canada because Canada is excepted by the last paragraph of Article 2 referred to, it may be urged that that paragraph does not appear to admit of a more extended interpretation than this: that the West Indies and British North America shall not be bound to give, or entitled to receive, the benefits which form the subject of that Convention; and the fact that Canada is expressly excluded from the operation of the Convention as a part of His Majesty's Dominions would appear to strengthen, rather than to weaken, the claim of the United Kingdom to most-favoured-nation treatment in the present case.

In these circumstances Sir E. Grey would be glad to be informed whether you consider that Canada is a "foreign country," or not, within the meaning of the Treaty of 1815, and also to be favoured with any observations of a general nature which you may desire to offer on the papers now submitted to you.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

THE Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to His Majesty's Attorney-General and Solicitor-General, and with reference to the letter from this Office of the 15th April last, has the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to enquire when he may expect to receive their report upon the meaning of Article 2 of the Convention of Commerce of the 3rd July, 1815, between the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

The question involved is to be raised by the Earl of Selborne in the House of Lords early next week, and it is important that Sir E. Grey should be able to advise Viscount Morley on the subject.

Foreign Office, May 11, 1911.

[18964]

Report.

[File 491/11.]

In our opinion, the words "any other foreign country," which are the material words in the first paragraph of Article 2 of the Treaty of 1815, relate to States other than the two Contracting States, and not to portions of the dominions of the Contracting States. In other words, Canada, whilst a "foreign country" in relation to the United States, is not "another foreign country" than Great Britain, but merely another part of the same foreign country, and a preference given by the United States to Canada is not, as regards Great Britain, a preference given to another foreign country, but is a preference given to Great Britain herself with respect to a portion of her own territory.

This interpretation of the first paragraph of Article 2 appears to us to be confirmed by the last paragraph of the same Article, for it would be strange to find the same place described in the first paragraph as "another country" and in the last as "part of His Majesty's possessions."

[April 24, 1912.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen.

Foreign Office, April 11, 1912.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State, to transmit to you the accompanying papers relative to the question of the issue of an Order in Council, to be entitled "The Bulgarian Order in Council, 1912," extending to Bulgaria the provisions of "The Ottoman Order in Council, 1910," subject to certain modifications.

Draft
Bulgarian Order in Council,
1912.

The territories which now form the Kingdom of Bulgaria were formerly part of the Ottoman Empire, and as such were subject to the Capitulations in force between the Sultan of Turkey and this country, under which British subjects were, in civil cases other than those concerning real property and in certain criminal cases, withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the local tribunals and were subject to Consular Courts established by their own Sovereign.

Bulgaria became an autonomous principality in 1878 and an independent kingdom in 1908. The number of British subjects resident in Bulgaria is very small, and of recent years there has been no occasion for the exercise on their behalf of the jurisdiction of British tribunals, but certain British plaintiffs have now commenced an action at Sophia by the issue of a writ against other British subjects, defendants in the British Consular Court at that capital.

The writ has been issued because they, and also British consular officers in Bulgaria, have been under the impression that "The Ottoman Order in Council, 1910," applied to Bulgaria, and that such a court existed under that Order. Sir E. Grey is, however, advised that this is not the case, since "The Ottoman Order in Council, 1910," is expressly limited in its scope to the Ottoman Dominions, and the Kingdom of Bulgaria has now ceased to be part of those Dominions.

His Majesty's Government have consistently maintained up to the present time that the Capitulations are still in force in Bulgaria, and cannot at this juncture abandon that contention though negotiations are in progress with the Bulgarian Government for their abolition on certain conditions which have not yet been fulfilled on the part of that Government. In the circumstances Sir E. Grey feels that it is desirable to issue an Order in Council under "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," which will apply to Bulgaria the judicial machinery established for the Ottoman Dominions by the Ottoman Order in Council. The accompanying draft Order in Council (Paper A) has accordingly been prepared for this purpose.

BULGARIA.

The proposed Order in Council applies "The Ottoman Order in Council, 1910" (Paper B), to Bulgaria, with such modifications as appear to be necessary, but does not confer on His Majesty's Minister at Sophia the power to issue King's Regulations thereunder. It brings Bulgaria within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court at Constantinople, established under "The Ottoman Order in Council, 1910," so as to obviate any separate appointment of the Judges of that court under the new Order.

Article 2 of the Order is intended to meet in advance any contention which might be raised that certain fees which appear in rare instances to have been levied in the Consular Courts in Bulgaria were wrongly levied and should be repaid, and also to confer ex post facto validity on the issue of the writ and on the steps taken in the earlier stages of the case already mentioned, to which the accompanying correspondence with his Majesty's Minister at Sophia relates. (Papers C, D, and E.)

Sir E. Grey desires me to request that you will take the matter into your consideration, and favour him, at your earliest possible convenience, with your opinion whether, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the terms of the proposed Order in Council are right and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

ANNEX.

Bulgarian Order in Council.

WHEREAS by Treaty, Capitulation, grant, usage, sufferance, and other lawful means, His Majesty the King has jurisdiction within the territories which now constitute the Kingdom of Bulgaria, and whereas doubts have arisen whether adequate means are at present in force for the exercise of such jurisdiction:

Now, therefore, His Majesty, by virtue and in exercise of the powers in that behalf by "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," or otherwise in His Majesty vested, is pleased, by and with the advice of His Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, as follows:—

1. Subject to the other provisions of this Order and to any Treaties for the time being in force relating to Bulgaria, "The Ottoman Order in Council, 1910," shall, from and after the date of this Order, be deemed to be in force in Bulgaria, as if Bulgaria were substituted therein for "the Ottoman Dominions," subject to the exceptions, adaptations, and modifications following:—

- (1.) Articles 144–170 of the said Order shall not apply to Bulgaria.
- (2.) The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court under the said Order shall include Bulgaria.
- (3.) Except where the context otherwise requires, the Kingdom of Bulgaria is hereby substituted for the Ottoman Dominions, and the Bulgarian Government for the Sublime Ottoman Porte, and Bulgarian subjects for Ottoman subjects, and His Majesty's Minister for the Ambassador, wherever such expressions occur in the said Order.

BULGARIA.—CHINA.

(4.) Provincial Courts shall be held at Sophia, Varna, and Philippopolis, without such further appointment as is prescribed in the said Order, and the districts of the said Courts shall be the districts of the commissioned consular officers there stationed, provided that the Provincial Court at Sophia shall not exercise jurisdiction within the districts of the Provincial Courts at Varna or Philippopolis.

(5.) No local Court shall be established in Bulgaria.

(6.) For the purposes of Part II of "The Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881," Bulgaria and the other places named in Article 89 (d) of the said Order shall be deemed to be one group of British possessions.

2.—(1.) All proceedings which may have been taken in any Consular Court of His Majesty in Bulgaria previous to the passing of this Order shall be deemed to have been valid; and no such proceedings shall be questioned upon the ground of any lack of authority on the part of the Court in or before which they were taken.

(2.) Where any proceedings have been commenced in any Consular Court of His Majesty in Bulgaria, and are still pending at the date of this Order, all steps taken in the course of such proceedings shall be deemed to be valid, provided that they would have been valid if taken after the date of this Order.

(3.) This Order shall come into force forthwith.

(4.) This Order may be cited as "The Bulgarian Order in Council, 1912." And the Right Honourable Sir Edward Grey, Baronet, K.G., one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, is to give the necessary directions herein.

The Law Officers of the Crown to Colonial Office.

Law Officers' Department, January 29, 1912.

Sir,

WE were honoured with your commands signified in Mr. G. V. Fiddes's letter of the 21st October last, stating that he was directed by you to inform us that the Governor of Hong Kong had enquired whether the Royal Letters Patent of the 22nd October, 1866, empowering the officer for the time being administering the Government to pardon criminals convicted of offences by Her late Majesty's Consular Courts in China and Japan, were still in force. That copies of the Letters Patent of the 22nd October, 1866, and of all other Letters Patent issued for Hong Kong since that date were sent for our information.

That Mr. Fiddes was to observe that the Letters Patent expressly empowered the Governor of Hong Kong to exercise the Royal prerogative of pardon in respect of any British subjects who might be sent to undergo imprisonment in the Colony under the provisions of "The China and Japan Order in Council, 1865."

That that Order in Council was repealed by "The China and Corea Order in Council, 1904," but that it was expressly provided by section 169 of the latter Order that such repeal should not take away or abridge any protection or benefit given or to be enjoyed in relation to any of the Orders in Council repealed by "The China and Corea Order in Council, 1904." Further, that section 67 of sub-section 2 of the same Order provided that nothing in the Order should affect the King's prerogative of pardon; and that it was conceived that that provision would apply to any delegation of the prerogative.

That, in view of those circumstances and of the fact that the Letters Patent did not appear ever to have been specifically repealed, you were disposed to think that they were still in force, but that you had learnt that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was of opinion that they were not in force at present. That Sir E. Grey considered that they would have remained in force in the case of prisoners who were sent to undergo imprisonment in Hong Kong under the provisions of the Order in Council of 1865, but that he added that that question did not now arise, as it was understood that the oldest sentence at present being served dated back only to September 1907, i.e., to a date subsequent to the issue of the second Order in Council.

Report—

That, in our opinion, the Letters Patent of the 22nd October, 1866, though still in force to the extent of their application, are no longer effective to enable the prerogative of pardon to be exercised by the Governor of Hong Kong in the case of all persons who may be convicted under the China and Corea Order of 1904 and sent to Hong Kong for imprisonment. Under the latter Order British subjects convicted in Corea and "protected persons" convicted in either China or Corea may be imprisoned at Hong Kong as well as British subjects convicted in China. Of these only the last class, namely, British subjects convicted in China, are within the scope of the Letters Patent of 1866. It is therefore necessary, in order to enable the prerogative to be exercised by the Governor in the other cases, that new Letters Patent should issue, and, that being the case, we consider it desirable that the new Letters Patent should deal with all cases of convictions under the Order of 1904.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, October 9, 1911.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit, for your consideration, the papers noted in the accompanying list relating to a case of conflict which has arisen between the British Consular Court and the Mixed Tribunal in Egypt. The particular case in question has now been disposed of by arrangement; but in view of the risk of similar occurrences in future, and of the attitude adopted by the Mixed Tribunal, Sir E. Grey is anxious to obtain the benefit of your opinion on the legal questions involved. The material facts of the case are briefly as follows:—

In October 1909 a local subject, Neguib Eheid, obtained judgment by default before the Mixed Tribunal of Cairo against a British subject, by name Abramino Carasso, for a sum of about 230*l.* No steps were taken at the time to enforce the judgment, and under Article 389 of the Mixed Code of Procedure, Civil and Commercial, it prima facie became of no effect after remaining unexecuted for six months. It appears, however, that the debtor, at some unknown date, noted upon the judgment his "acquiescal" therein. The legal effect of this proceeding appears to be doubtful, but no objection to the rights of Eheid has been taken on that ground in the case.

On the 30th December, 1910, a British subject named Silley obtained judgment before his Britannic Majesty's Provincial Court at Cairo against Carasso for 340*l.* 14*s.*

The Mixed Courts in Egypt were established under the provisions of the "Règlement d'Organisation judiciaire" (Paper 35). His Britannic Majesty's Provincial Court at Cairo was established by Order in Council under "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890." The Order in Council at present in force in Egypt is "The Ottoman Order in Council, 1910" (Paper 34).

On the 31st December Neguib Eheid applied to the Mixed Tribunal for execution under the judgment of October 1909. There is some ground for suspecting that this action was taken in collusion with the debtor.

Under Article 18 (Title 1) of the Mixed Rules as to Judicial Organisation ("Règlement d'Organisation judiciaire") under which the Mixed Tribunal came into existence, it is necessary for the "huissier" of the Mixed Tribunal to notify, under penalty of nullity, any intended execution to the Consulate of the nationality to which the debtor belongs. By an error the notification was given in Neguib Eheid's case to the Italian Consulate instead of to the British.

Thereupon, on the 4th January, 1911, the "huissier" of the Mixed Court appears to have entered the debtor's flat, and to have purported to seize the goods therein, leaving the debtor in charge as judicial guardian. No official document was left, as is apparently necessary under section 510 of the "Code de Procédure civile et commerciale," nor were seals placed on the door.

On the same day (4th January) execution issued under the Consular judgment, and the Marshal went to the debtor's flat to seize his furniture. He arrived after the departure of the "huissier," and it is stated that he was informed by the debtor of what had occurred. He formally took possession of the furniture, made an inventory, and stationed an Egyptian policeman outside the flat. Subsequently the Consular seals were attached to the outer door. The sale of the furniture was then fixed for the 10th January and duly advertised.

On the 7th January the Mixed Tribunal authorities served upon the British Consulate a notice in due form of their intention to levy execution on the goods of Carasso. Upon this notice the Consul made the following annotation:—

"Par un jugement rendu par le Tribunal consulaire britannique, une saisie-exécution sur les meubles de Abramino Carasso a déjà été faite par le Ministère de ce Consulat.

"Les objets en question sont dans la possession de ce Consulat, qui est en train de réaliser en satisfaction du jugement précité; par conséquent aucune autre saisie ne peut être pratiquée.

"ARTHUR D. ALBAN,

His Britannic Majesty's Consul.

(L.S.)

"Consulat de Sa Majesté britannique,
"Le Caire, le 7 janvier, 1911."

Notwithstanding this warning, the "huissier," acting, as it is believed, under the orders of the President of the Mixed Tribunal, affixed the seals of the Mixed Tribunal upon the doors of the flat on the morning of the 10th January. The goods were thus in the custody of both Courts, and a conflict of jurisdiction arose.

The British Consul was authorised by Sir Eldon Gorst to address to the President of the Mixed Tribunal a letter, copy of which is sent herewith, protesting against the action of the Mixed Tribunal. The President replied that in similar cases foreign Consuls recognised the mixed jurisdiction, but that he was willing to remove the mixed seals and consent to the Consular sale on condition that the proceeds were paid into the Mixed Tribunal.

After some correspondence it was agreed, in order to avoid an unseemly dispute and possible disturbance, that the sale should be carried out by the Consular Court, and the proceeds lodged in the National Bank of Egypt to be paid out to the person to whom they should eventually be found to be due, the rights of all parties being reserved. The sale then took place, and the proceeds were paid into the bank.

Considerable correspondence ensued. It was at one time feared that the "mixed" creditor would apply to the Mixed Tribunal to attach the sum at the bank, but he did not do so. The Consular creditor did, however, apply to the Consular Court for an order directing the Marshal to pay to him the proceeds of the sale. This was refused, and the creditor lodged an appeal to the Supreme Court. When the appeal was heard the facts were not fully put before the Court; the Marshal admitted that officially the amount was in possession of the Court, and the Judge, though aware unofficially that difficulties had arisen in the matter, felt himself bound, as the application was practically unopposed, to make the order. The matter was then settled by the British Government paying to the "mixed" creditor a sum equivalent to the proceeds of the sale, while the money deposited in the bank was paid out to the Consular creditor. The immediate dispute thus terminated, both parties expressly maintaining their opinions.

Generally, it may be said that the views of the Mixed Tribunal were supported by the late Sir Eldon Gorst and his advisers, while the Department was inclined to uphold the contentions of the Consular Court. The difficulty of the position in which the Secretary of State found himself, being bound at the same time to maintain the interests of the British creditor and those of the Egyptian Government, is apparent.

The views of the Mixed Tribunal will be found in the following documents:—

Memorandum by the Procureur général, the 11th February, 1911.

Memorandum by Sir M. McIlwraith, the 15th February, 1911.

Letter from the Vice-President of the Mixed Tribunal to the Minister of Justice, the 24th May, 1911.

Similar letter from the Procureur général, the 24th May, 1911.

Letter (with enclosures) from the Procureur général to the Judicial Adviser, the 10th June, 1911, with notes by the Judicial Adviser on the precedents cited.

The contentions of the Consular Court are embodied in the following documents:—

Letter from the British Consul to the President of the Mixed Tribunal, the 12th January, 1911.

Despatch from the Secretary of State to Sir E. Gorst, the 13th April, 1911.

Minute by Judge Cator, the 1st April, 1911.

Despatch from Judge Cator to the Secretary of State, the 14th August, 1911.

Letter from Judge Cator to Sir E. Davidson, the 15th August, 1911.

It may be remarked that most of the precedents quoted are cases not of judicial decisions, but of consular action; while, where judicial decisions are cited, they are of necessity given by one or other of the Courts which are parties to the present dispute. There is no doubt that the Mixed Tribunal is prepared, if opportunity arises, to decide all the points involved in its own favour, and that it is, and has been for some time, desirous of extending its jurisdiction in every possible way, and thus encroaching on the jurisdiction of the Consular Courts.

There are really three questions involved, and the arguments used may be briefly summarised under three heads:—

1. The Mixed Tribunal contends that the seizure made by its officer on the 4th January was good and valid, and that therefore the mixed seizure was in point of fact anterior to the consular. The words of Article 18 (Title 1) of the "Règlement d'Organisation judiciaire," "Seulement l'officier de justice chargé de l'exécution, par le Tribunal est obligé d'avertir les consulats du jour et de l'heure de l'exécution, et ce à peine de nullité et de dommages-intérêts contre lui," are said to mean only that the absence of proper notice to the Consulate rendered the seizure not void, but only voidable by the Mixed Tribunal; so that, no application to have the seizure declared void having been made, it remained valid. In support of this contention a case is quoted in which the Mixed Court of Appeal held that the absence of notice to the Consulate was a purely personal plea which could only be set up by the debtor himself, and which he could forego either expressly or tacitly.

The view taken by the Consular Court is that the failure to notify the Consulate rendered the seizure, under the terms of the Article in question, null and void, and that therefore the consular seizure was prior to time. This view is supported by the action of the Mixed Tribunal in giving notice to the British Consulate and levying a second execution. It is obvious that if the contention of the Mixed Court is correct, it would much facilitate the taking of collusive proceedings, such as are believed to have occurred in this case.

2. Assuming that the consular seizure was, in fact, prior to the mixed one, the Mixed Tribunal contends that in cases where such a conflict of jurisdiction has arisen, the Mixed Tribunal alone is competent to decide which jurisdiction is to prevail. Reliance is placed on the fact that no provision was made in the "Règlement d'Organisation judiciaire" for the establishment of a Court to decide on such questions of conflict in civil affairs, as was done in the case of criminal matters, and also on the terms of Article 18 (Title 1) of the "Règlement," "L'exécution des jugements aura lieu en dehors de toute action administrative, consulaire ou autre . . .", as interpreted in the light of the preliminary discussions as to the wording of the Article. The cases which are quoted by the Procureur général in his Memorandum of the 11th February, 1911, and letter of the 18th May, 1911, seem to have more bearing on the third point. Although the point does not seem to have been raised in this case, another argument may be founded on the wording of Article 22 of "The Ottoman Order in Council, 1910," which deals inter alia with the constitution and powers of the Egyptian Consular Court, or, more accurately, the "Provincial Court at Cairo" or elsewhere:—

"All His Majesty's jurisdiction, civil and criminal, not under this Order vested exclusively in the Supreme Court, shall to the extent and in the manner provided by this Order be vested in the Provincial and Local Courts.

"Provided that, as regards all such matters and cases as come within the jurisdiction of any Egyptian Courts established with the concurrence of His Majesty, the operation of this Order is hereby suspended until His Majesty, by and with the advice of His Privy Council, shall otherwise order."

This Article is reproduced verbatim from the former Order. It would be possible to argue that the Consular Court is unable to decide whether a particular case comes within the jurisdiction of an Egyptian Court (in this case the Mixed Court) administering a foreign law of which the Consular Court officially knows nothing, and that therefore the Mixed Tribunal is alone competent to decide the question of jurisdiction.

In support of the position of the Consular Court, it may be argued that every Court has the right to decide whether a particular case is within its jurisdiction or not. Article 18 of the "Règlement" refers only to administrative Consular interference, and not to the interference of another duly constituted Judicial Tribunal acting in pursuance of jurisdiction which properly belonged to it. Judge Cator refers to two cases in which it was held that the Consular Court had authority to decide the question of jurisdiction. One of these cases is the one now under discussion, and it appears from Assistant Judge Grain's letter of the 14th August, 1911, to Judge Cator, which is sent herewith, that the facts of the case were not fully before the Court. The other case, that of Reid, Barnard and Co. v. Russell, was decided by Judge Cator, and a copy of his judgment accompanies. A copy of an opinion on the decision by Mr. Brunyate, one of the legal advisers to the Egyptian Government, is sent herewith, from which it will be seen that he considers that Judge Cator exceeded his powers in accepting jurisdiction; but of course unless the Privy Council has an opportunity of pronouncing on the question, that judgment will remain binding on the Consular Court.

3. On behalf of the Mixed Tribunal, the Procureur général of the Egyptian Government contends that the effect of the appearance of a "mixed" interest is to put an end to the jurisdiction of the Consular Court, and to transfer the affair to the Mixed Tribunal. It would follow that the duty of the Consular Court was to remove its seals and officers and hand over the property to the custody of the Mixed Tribunal. The claim is put in the widest possible way: "Dès l'apparition d'un intérêt mixte avant la complète exécution d'un jugement consulaire, l'affaire devenait mixte, et seule la juridiction mixte pouvait statuer sur les droits respectifs des parties."

Reliance is placed on Article 9 (Title 1) of the "Règlement d'Organisation judiciaire": "Ces Tribunaux connaîtront seules de toutes les contestations en matière civile et commerciale entre indigènes et étrangers, et entre étrangers de nationalités différentes, en dehors du statut personnel."

A considerable number of precedents are also quoted in support of the proposition. Many of these are cases of bankruptcy, and may therefore not be considered to be in point, though the Procureur général argues that they are. The cases which seem most important are those of Meimaris, Lévy, and Rottolo (quoted in the Procureur général's Memorandum of the 11th February, 1911), and Condogeorgis, Kemner, Crossland, and Schaefer (cited in the enclosures to his letter of the 10th June, 1911, to the Judicial Adviser). The last case is of particular importance, both because the facts were very similar to those of the present case, and because the Mixed Tribunal gave a decision which shows clearly how they would deal with all similar cases if their jurisdiction were established.

Sir E. Grey is advised that cases in which the Consular Courts saw fit to give way do not constitute binding precedents. The present case is not so much one of a conflict of jurisdiction, but of a concurrent and overlapping jurisdiction. This being so, and the Consular Court having put in its execution first, the ordinary maxim, "Qui prior est tempore potior est jure," applies, and the Consular Court was entitled to carry out the sale and satisfy its judgment out of the proceeds, any balance being handed over to the Mixed Tribunal. It will be seen that Judge Cator has expressed some doubt whether this view can be supported except on the ground that the property in the goods has passed to the creditors; but to meet this view it would be sufficient Egyptian Civil and Commercial Procedure Code, such service being effected through the Solicitor to the Treasury, and this procedure has been followed up to the present time. A memorandum setting forth in detail the circumstances in which this service was undertaken is enclosed (No. 2 of Paper (E)).

The present question has arisen in consequence of the service of a writ upon Mr. G. S. Pitt in connection with the liabilities incurred in Egypt by a company trading under the style of H. F. Kerr and Co. The circumstances leading up to the service of this writ are briefly outlined in the minute on the letter from Waltons and Co. of the 7th March last (Paper (C)). As the result of representations made in the matter, His Majesty's agent and consul-general at Cairo was instructed on the 25th March last to furnish a report on the whole subject, and two despatches have now been received from Lord Kitchener (Papers (H) and (I)), the one stating that the procureur général had abandoned proceedings against Mr. Pitt, and the other enclosing opinions by the legal adviser to the Egyptian Ministry of Justice and by the senior member of the Egyptian State Legal Department on the general obligation of His Majesty's Government to effect service of writs in criminal cases.

A letter has also been received (Paper (J)) from Mr. A. S. Preston, British Crown Advocate in Egypt, who has acted as Mr. Pitt's professional adviser, enclosing notes by himself and by the senior Khedivial councillor on the subject, and a summary of the arguments on both sides will be found in the minute by Mr. Malkin on Lord Kitchener's despatch No. 26, Treaty, of the 3rd instant (Paper (I)). Sir Edward is disposed to concur in the view expressed in that minute and in that held by Mr. Preston rather than in the arguments set forth on behalf of the Egyptian Government by Sir M. McIlwraith and Señor de Rocca Serra. The fact that the provision for service of documents through the diplomatic channel, a provision which has been accepted and acted upon by His Majesty's Government, appears only in the Egyptian Code de Procédure civile et commerciale, and not in the Règlement d'Organisation Judiciaire, the Code Pénal, or the Code d'Instruction Criminelle, would appear, according to the ordinary rules of construction "expressio unius est exclusio alterius" and "expressum facit cessare tacitum," to indicate that the obligation of His Majesty's Government to effect service of documents emanating from the mixed courts does not extend to criminal matters, especially as the mixed courts at the time of their establishment were given criminal jurisdiction in certain cases. Sir E. Grey is also advised that there is no general rule of international law which compels His Majesty's Government to effect service of documents emanating from foreign tribunals in criminal matters, and in this connection it is of interest to observe that the convention signed by most of the European Powers (but not by Great Britain) on the 17th July, 1905 (Paper (K)), which provides for the mutual service of judicial documents, is expressly confined to civil and commercial matters.

I am to request that you will take these papers into your consideration, and that you will favour the Secretary of State with your opinion—

1. Whether, having regard to the fact that His Majesty's Government have only undertaken, in accordance with article 11 of the Civil and Commercial Code of Procedure, to serve writs in civil and commercial cases, and that no corresponding provision exists in the Règlement d'Organisation Judiciaire, the Code Pénal, or the Code d'Instruction Criminelle, they are under any obligation to effect service in the case of writs issued by the mixed tribunals in criminal cases.

2. If not, whether the Egyptian Government may properly be informed that, in criminal cases, service should be effected through a private agent without the intervention of His Majesty's Government.

3. Sir Edward would also be glad to be furnished with any observations of a general nature which you may desire to offer upon the papers now submitted to you.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 15, 1912.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit for your consideration the papers noted in the accompanying list relating to the power of His Majesty's Consul-General at Port Said to arrest and detain persons under suspicion of being deserters from the British Army in India.

You will observe that the Government of India consider (Paper (C)) that the Consul-General has such power under Articles 25 and 28 of the Ottoman Order in Council, 1899 (now represented by Articles 35 and 36 of the Ottoman Order in Council, 1910, Paper (A)), combined with section 154 of the Army Act (Paper (B)), and that the Judge Advocate-General is, for the reasons given in his minute (Paper (G)), of the same opinion. Sir E. Grey is, however, advised that the correctness of this opinion is, at any rate, open to some doubt.

Under Article 35 (1) of the Ottoman Order in Council, 1910, "any Act that would not by a Court of Justice having criminal jurisdiction in England be deemed an offence in England shall not, in the exercise of criminal jurisdiction under this Order, be deemed an offence, or be the subject of any criminal proceeding under this Order"; and under Article 36 of the same Order in Council "every Court may cause to be summoned or arrested, and brought before it, any person subject to, and being within the limits of, its jurisdiction, and accused of having committed an offence cognisable under this Order" It seems clear, therefore, that the Consul-General, as Judge of the Provincial Court at Port Said, can only deal with persons charged with desertion if desertion is an act that would be deemed an offence in England by a Court of Justice having criminal jurisdiction in England. The powers of Courts of Justice in England as to deserters are conferred on them by section 154 of the Army Act, the heading of which is "Apprehension of Deserters," and under that section the Courts have no power to punish such persons, but can only, on being satisfied that they are deserters, deliver them into military custody. Sir E. Grey is advised that in order to constitute an act an "offence in England" within the meaning of Article 35 (1) of the Ottoman Order in Council, such act must be punishable by criminal proceedings in an English Criminal Court, and that an act which merely gives the Court power to hand the prisoner over to the military authorities is not an "offence" within the meaning of that Article.

In this connection it may be useful to compare the provisions of sections 221 and 238 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894." Under the former section desertion from a British ship is described as an "offence," and is punishable by the Criminal Court; under the latter desertion from a foreign ship merely gives the Court power to send the man on board his ship, and is not described as an "offence."

There is, of course, no doubt that desertion is, under section 12 of the Army Act, an offence against military law, but Sir E. Grey is advised that that fact does not render it an act which would be deemed an "offence in England" by an English Criminal Court. There are several acts which, under Part I of the Army Act, are offences against military law, such as simple drunkenness by a soldier, which would certainly not be regarded as an "offence" by an English Criminal Court. I am also to draw your attention to the fact that "offence" is defined in the Ottoman Order (Article 3) as including crime and any act or omission punishable criminally in a summary way or otherwise. It is suggested that the opinion of the Judge Advocate-General, that "desertion is by statute (Army Act) an 'offence' in England," can hardly mean more than that desertion is by statute an offence against military law; and the further opinion of the Judge Advocate-General, that the word "offence," "in view of the heading to Part I of the Act, may be taken to be equivalent to 'crime,'" would appear only to be applicable when the word "crime" is used, as it is in the passage quoted, in its technical military sense.

With regard to the latter part of section 154, subsection 3, of the Army Act, on which reliance is placed by the Judge Advocate-General, Sir E. Grey is advised, in view of the heading and the other provisions of the section, that these words should be taken as referring merely to the procedure to be adopted in deciding whether the person charged with being a deserter shall be handed over to the military authorities.

It would appear also that even assuming that a Criminal Court "can take cognisance" of a charge of desertion, or "exercise jurisdiction in the matter," it can only regard desertion as an offence against military law, which is not punishable under the only law which the Court is entitled to administer, and that these facts could therefore hardly justify the statement that the Court would deem it an "offence in England" within the meaning of Article 35 (1) of the Ottoman Order in Council, 1910.

In these circumstances, I have the honour to request that you will take these papers into your consideration, and inform Sir E. Grey whether, in your opinion, His Majesty's Consul-General at Port Said, as Judge of the Provincial Consular Court at that place, has power under Articles 35 and 36 of the Ottoman Order in Council, 1910, combined with section 154 of the Army Act, to arrest and detain persons suspected of being deserters from the British Army in India, with the object of handing them over to the military authorities.

Sir E. Grey would be glad to be furnished at the same time with any general observations which you may be good enough to offer on the subject.

Report.

In our opinion, desertion is an act which would, "by a Court of Justice having criminal jurisdiction in England, be deemed an offence in England." The fact that the duty of punishing the offence is entrusted by the Army Act to a court-martial does not make it the less an offence. That this is so is made clear by section 153 of the Army Act, which enables the Civil Courts to impose imprisonment on persons not subject to military law for aiding and abetting desertion.

In our opinion, therefore, His Majesty's Consul-General at Port Said, as Judge of the Provincial Consular Court at that place, has power under Articles 35 and 36 of the Ottoman Order in Council, 1910, combined with section 154 of the Army Act, to arrest and detain persons suspected of being deserters from the British Army in India, with the object of handing them over to the military authorities.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. E. W. Hansell.

Question 1.

WHAT is the position of foreign creditors under an English bankruptcy?

All creditors, whatever their nationality, are entitled to prove their debts under an English bankruptcy, and to share in the assets pari passu. Certain debts, however, for rates, taxes, salary and wages are entitled to preferential payment over those due to the general body of creditors. But there is this limitation, that if a foreign creditor has received in the foreign country under process of law any payment on account of his debt he must "bring in for the purpose of dividend the sum which he has received abroad." As was said by Lord Eldon, "It has been decided that a person cannot come in under an English Commission without bringing into the common fund what he has received abroad;" and Lord Eldon goes on to point out, what is obviously the case, that a creditor, because he happened personally to be in England, would not be obliged to bring this sum in to the common fund; he might keep it if he liked; he might ignore the English bankruptcy if he pleased (per Lord Cairns, L.C., in Banco de Portugal v. Waddell, 5 A.C., at p. 167). No contribution to the assets need, however, be made in respect of anything received by virtue of the law of the foreign country apart from process there, e.g., under a mortgage or charge obtaining in the foreign country and recognised by its law. (Re Somes 3, Manson 131.)

Position of foreign creditors under an English bankruptcy. Rights of a trustee in an English bankruptcy to property of the bankrupt situate abroad, and mutatis mutandis.

Question 2.

What are the rights of a trustee in an English bankruptcy to property of the bankrupt situate abroad, and of a trustee in a foreign bankruptcy to property of the bankrupt situate in England?

(a.) As to movables.

The English Act vests in the trustee in an English bankruptcy all the movables of the bankrupt, wherever situate.

And the English courts recognise the title of a trustee in a foreign bankruptcy to such movables in England as would, by the law of the country where the bankruptcy takes place, pass to him, and will uphold such title against a subsequent trustee in an English bankruptcy or suing creditor. (See Foote's "Private International Jurisprudence," 3rd edition, p. 326, and cases cited; re Anderson 1911, 1 K.B. 896.) There appears to be no such exception as that created by the Danish Royal Order of the 30th November, 1821.

(b.) As to immovables.

The English Act purports to vest in the trustee immovable property abroad, but only subject to all local laws (ex parte Rogers, 16 Ch. D., 665), the title of the trustee being dependent on the lex situs, and unless the English court orders the bankrupt to convey the land in accordance with the local law, and the local courts recognise such title, the trustee could not effectively obtain the benefit of the property for the creditors. So also a trustee in a foreign bankruptcy would not get a title to immovable property situate in England merely by virtue of the foreign bankruptcy law, but if the foreign court thought fit to compel the bankrupt to convey the land to the trustee by a conveyance in accordance with English law, thus giving a title independent of the foreign law, the English courts would recognise and give effect to such title (see Foote, p. 229).

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, December 4, 1911.

Arrest of Fugitive
Criminals on German
Merchant-ships in British Territorial Waters.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to enclose, for your consideration, a selection of printed correspondence* which has passed between this Department, the Home and Colonial Offices and His Majesty's Embassy at Berlin within the past few years, respecting futile attempts to effect the arrest of fugitive criminals on board of German merchant-vessels calling at Southampton on their way from South Africa to Germany. The difficulties placed by the commanders of these vessels in the way of British police officers endeavouring to carry out their duty have, in two cases, enabled the fugitives concerned to evade the ends of justice, and His Majesty's Government have accordingly to consider what steps they can properly take to obviate a recurrence of such incidents.

The circumstances of the two cases referred to are as follows:—

On the 9th December, 1905, a telegram from Cape Town was received by the Agent-General for the Cape, stating that a warrant had been issued in the Colony for the apprehension of one Elias Goldstein, a Polish Jew, on the charge of fraudulent insolvency, an offence punishable with hard labour for twelve months. He was stated to be a passenger on the German liner "Ernst Woermann," due at Southampton on the 15th December, and it was requested that steps might be taken for his arrest on the arrival of the vessel at that port, with a view to his rendition to Cape Colony under the provisions of the Fugitive Offenders Act. The Agent-General thereupon communicated with the authorities at Scotland Yard, and, as a result of this communication, a provisional warrant of arrest was issued at the Bow Street Police Court on the 12th December. What subsequently happened is explained in detail in the extract of the police report (Enclosure 4 in No. 1 of Print). A Metropolitan police officer proceeded from London to Southampton on the 14th December, where he called upon the Chief Constable of Hampshire, who detailed a detective-sergeant to assist him in executing his provisional warrant. He also called upon the German consul at Southampton, who gave him a letter, in German, addressed to the captain of the "Ernst Woermann." That vessel duly arrived in Southampton Water, and shortly after 6 A.M. on the 16th December the two police officers went out in the tender to where the "Ernst Woermann" was lying off Netley Hospital. There they handed the letter from the German consul to the officer (Captain Schade) in command of the vessel, and they also found Goldstein with his wife and child on board travelling second class to Hamburg.

Captain Schade refused to allow the officers to take the fugitive off the ship on the ground that he was a German on a German vessel. (As a matter of fact, he was not a German, but a Russian subject.) Goldstein declined to go on board the tender, and the police officers had no alternative but to return to shore, and the vessel proceeded on its voyage. The subsequent efforts of this Department to trace the man's movements on the Continent with a view to his possible extradition thence proved abortive, and nothing more was heard of him.

The circumstances of the second incident are set out in detail in the enclosures in the Home Office letter of the 1st February, 1909 (No. 18 of Print). Stated shortly, they are as follows:—

At 6.30 P.M. on the 23rd December, 1908, a telegram was received at Scotland Yard from the Attorney-General, Cape Town, requesting the arrest of William and Christoffelina Elizabeth Hoffmann, of whom the first named was believed to be a German. They were charged with the offence of forgery and uttering at Cape Town, and were reported to be passengers on the German steam-ship "Bürgermeister," due at Southampton the following day.

On receipt of this message a telegram (Enclosure 3 in No. 18 of Print) was dispatched from Scotland Yard to the chief constable at Southampton requesting him to keep the fugitives under observation, and adding that a provisional warrant of arrest would be applied for on the following day. This was done, and the warrant was issued at 10.45 A.M. on the 24th. There was no time to send it to be made use of at Southampton, as the vessel arrived at that port on the afternoon of the same day, but the Southampton police were notified by telegraph of its issue, and were requested to effect the arrest of the Hoffmanns (Enclosure 4 in No. 18 of Print).

The "Bürgermeister" duly arrived and anchored off Netley on the afternoon of the 24th, when Detective-Sergeant Pollock boarded the steamer. His action is fully detailed in his report (Enclosure 1 in No. 18 of Print). He failed to obtain the assent of the captain to the arrest of the Hoffmanns, nor could he persuade them to go on shore in the tender. He accordingly had to leave them on board, and returned on the tender to Southampton. Nothing further was heard of these persons, and efforts made to obtain their provisional arrest, with a view to extradition, proved of no avail.

I am now to invite your consideration of the correspondence which has passed with the German Government and with His Majesty's Embassy at Berlin in regard to these two incidents (Papers numbered 3, 5, 6, 7, 12, 14, 16, 19, 23, 24, 33, 34, 35, 39, and 42 in the enclosed Print).

In their reply to the representations addressed to them in the case of Goldstein (Enclosure in No. 7 of Print), the German Government defended the attitude taken up by the captain of the "Ernst Woermann" on grounds to which, in Sir E. Grey's opinion, no great weight can well be attached.]

These grounds shortly were:—

1. That the German consul at Southampton had merely given the police officer a letter to the captain to assist that officer in a visit of search, and it was not an instruction to allow an arrest on the ship.
2. That the police officer did not consider himself authorised to effect such arrest.
3. That in 1881, the magistrate at Bow Street had expressed doubts as to whether a warrant could be legally executed on a German ship only touching at Southampton.
4. That there was a distinction between an arrest on land and an arrest on board of a merchant-ship lying in British territorial waters.
5. That the arrest was analogous to a case for extradition to a third country, and that the consent of the German Government was therefore a pre-requisite for such an arrest, and that it would, presumably, have been given had it been asked for.

On these points it is to be observed that no evidence could be traced of the magistrate at Bow Street, in 1881 (the late Sir James Vaughan), ever having expressed any such view as that attributed to him in Fertig's case (see No. 10 of Print); that there was no question of any extradition to a third State, and that considerations of time alone would have made it impossible to have obtained the consent of the Imperial German Government without detaining the ship pending the result of the necessary communications between the two Governments. His Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin was consequently instructed to bring these considerations to the notice of the German Government (No. 12 of Print), but no further communication was received from them so far as the Goldstein case was concerned.

After the lapse of many months that Government replied to the enquiry made by His Majesty's Government as to the grounds on which the arrest of the Hoffmanns had been opposed by the captain of the steam-ship "Bürgermeister." This reply is contained in Paper No. 24. In it some stress was laid on the circumstance of the police having no warrant [Superintendent Froest observes, with much force (Enclosure 2 in No. 18 of Print), that it would have made no difference if they had had a warrant in their possession, and the production of a warrant certainly produced no better result in Goldstein's case], and they reverted to the argument already advanced that their consent was necessary because the case was in the nature of an extradition to a third State, instancing, in support of this contention, that when a fugitive criminal was extradited from Canada to Germany, and was disembarked to cross this country in transitu, the Imperial Government were required to commence extradition proceedings de novo to some extent in England. This unfortunately is the case at present, and the reasons why this formality is deemed to be necessary, in Canadian cases, is fully explained on pp. 32 and 33 of the Print, in a memorandum by Mr. Maycock, the Superintendent of the Treaty Department of this Office. It will be seen on reference to the Home Office letter of the 10th February, 1910 (No. 30 of Print), that it is contemplated to consider what practical steps can be adopted to remove this anomaly, and to place Canada on the same footing, in this respect, as all other parts of His Majesty's Dominions.

The reply which His Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin was instructed to make to the German Government will be found in paper No. 33, and the rejoinder thereto of Herr Kiderlen-Waechter is in paper No. 34 of the Print. The Imperial Government in this last-mentioned note emphatically reiterate that they will not assent to any kind of British warrant being executed, unless their consent has been previously obtained, on German ships of commerce—lying only temporarily in British waters, and allusion is made to their sovereign rights over such ships.

Sir Edward Grey is unable to see that the general principle involved is in the remotest degree affected by the circumstance of whether the duration of the stay of a foreign merchant-ship in a British port is brief or protracted.

The last despatch addressed to His Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin is that in No. 35 of the Print, in which is embodied such information as this Department possesses with regard to the practice of other countries in these matters, and the final reply of the German Government is in No. 42 of the printed correspondence. It will be gathered from it that the Imperial Government, while not claiming any extra-territoriality for German merchant-ships, and disclaiming any wish that they should be utilised as asylums for fugitive criminals, are unable to concur in the views of His Majesty's Government, and show no indication of abandoning the stand-point—reiterated so many times in their previous communications—that their consent is an absolute pre-requisite to the carrying out of an arrest on a merchant-ship flying the German flag in British territorial waters.

It will not escape your notice that, in this last communication, the German Government seek again to draw a distinction between the case of fugitive criminals who take refuge on merchant-vessels lying in foreign harbours, and fugitive criminals who are already on board of such vessels when they touch temporarily in such harbours. So far as Sir E. Grey is aware, there are no recognised grounds for any such distinction in international law. The note further seems to imply that a principle of general international law is created by the mere fact of the existence of certain specific provisions in a Consular Convention between Germany and the United States of America. Sir E. Grey, as at present advised, conceives this contention to be also untenable for the reasons stated by Sir Edward Davidson in his minute of the 3rd October last, printed on p. 55 of the correspondence enclosed, to which I am to invite your special attention.

Though perhaps not directly pertinent to the issue now involved, it may not be out of place to mention that, in consequence of a complaint made some years ago by the German consul-general at Cape Town that an arrest had been effected on a German merchant-vessel at that port without notice having been given to him, enquiries were made of His Majesty's consular officers at some of the principal German ports as to whether, in the converse case, they received any notice from the German authorities of arrests or contemplated arrests on British merchant-vessels. The replies showed that there was no uniformity of practice in such matters. In some places the police authorities notified the British consular officer after an arrest had been made, and in others no such notification was vouchsafed at all. At any rate, there is no record of the assent of His Majesty's Government having been solicited before such arrests were effected, nor would His Majesty's Government deem themselves justified in demanding it.

It will be seen from the Home Office letter of the 2nd instant (No. 45 of Print), that, pending a decision as to what action His Majesty's Government should take in the by no means improbable event of cases like those of Goldstein and the Hoffmanns recurring, the Metropolitan Police have been instructed not to attempt to execute any warrant issued either under the Extradition Acts or under the Fugitive Offenders Act on board a German merchant-ship touching at an English port.

The question, therefore, that demands the most careful consideration is whether, in the event of arrest being again obstructed, as in the cases of Goldstein and the Hoffmanns, His Majesty's Government would be warranted in taking forcible measures to carry out what Sir Edward Grey believes to be their indisputable rights, so far as the municipal law of this country is concerned, after having previously notified the German Government that they will feel compelled to do so in the interests of justice.

With regard to the resort to force, I am to invite your attention to the Departmental minutes on p. 26 of the Print; to the letter to the Home Office (No. 21 of Print) and minutes thereunder, and to the Home Office reply (No. 22 of Print); also to the paragraph at foot of p. 37 in the Home Office letter of the 10th February, 1910 (No. 30 of Print); and, lastly, to the Home Office letter of the 21st October last (No. 44 of Print). In the last-mentioned letter you will notice that the late Home Secretary thought it desirable that your opinion should also be invited on the subsidiary points therein set out.

I am accordingly to request that you will take this important question into your careful consideration and favour Sir Edward Grey with your opinion—

1. As to whether you consider the question of the obligation of His Majesty's Government under general principles of international law, or the usages of international comity, to obtain the assent of the Imperial Government before effecting arrests on German merchant-ships in British waters, which is the one point in dispute, is one in regard to which His Majesty's Government should propose to the German Government a submission to arbitration by The Hague Tribunal (on this point I am to direct your attention to the Home Office letter of the 21st December, 1910, and minutes thereon, No. 38 of the Print, as well as to the minutes on paper No. 44);

2. Should you consider that it is inexpedient to suggest such arbitration, as to whether His Majesty's Government would be warranted in informing the German Government that, as the arguments they have adduced have failed to convince them that their previous assent to arrests is not necessary, and that they are not entitled to demand it, and as it is useless to further prolong the discussion, His Majesty's Government regret that they will be under the disagreeable necessity, should another case arise, of taking effective steps to ensure the vindication of what they conceive to be their undoubted rights in respect to the execution of British warrants on board foreign merchant vessels touching at British ports;

3. As to the subsidiary questions raised in the Home Office letter of the 21st October last; and

4. That you will favour Sir E. Grey with any general observations you may think it desirable to offer on the whole subject, which is one of considerable importance both from a legal and from a political stand-point.

I have, &c.

F. A. CAMPBELL.

Report.

1. In our opinion, the principle of international law which is decisive of the present case is that a sovereign State has complete control over its ports and harbours, and that it may either exclude foreign vessels altogether from entering them for the purposes of trade, or may admit them upon such terms and conditions as it may choose.

This principle being conceded, it follows that the amount, if any, of exemption from the local jurisdiction which a sovereign State may allow to foreign vessels voluntarily entering its ports or harbours for the purposes of trade is a matter entirely for the territorial State to determine for itself. We think that there can be no doubt as to the correctness of the principle stated above, and that it would be most undesirable to suggest the possibility of a doubt upon it by offering to submit it to arbitration. We think it right, for the sake of clearness, to add that we confine ourselves to dealing with ports and harbours as distinct from territorial waters forming part of the littoral seas over which it might be contended that a right of innocent passage exists, and as to which, therefore, somewhat different considerations might apply.

Although no such point arises in the case now for our opinion, we think it right to indicate generally that, in the absence of notice or express agreement by consular convention or otherwise, a question might arise as to the extent of exemption from the territorial jurisdiction which is to be implied by international law from mere permission to enter and trade. Upon this point there is room for doubt both as to whether there is any such uniform and long-continued practice as to amount to international law at all, and if there is not such a uniform and long-continued practice, then as to the practice of any particular country.

2. We consider, therefore, that His Majesty's Government would be quite justified in giving notice to the German Government that it must be clearly understood for the future that we do not consider foreign merchant-vessels entering our ports and harbours as exempt from our territorial jurisdiction in any way, and that should occasion arise for the arrest of any person on board, the arrest will be effected and the ship detained for so long as may be necessary for this to be done.

3. The above answers apply to the four questions raised in the Home Office letter of the 21st October last.

No attempt to make an arrest should be undertaken unless the police are armed with a proper warrant, and notice that an arrest is to be made should be given to the consul of the vessel's nationality. The person to make the arrest should be conveyed to the foreign vessel by one of our own Government vessels and not in the company's tender.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, May 10, 1912.

SECRETARY SIR EDWARD GREY has received your report of the 15th March on the subject of attempts to arrest fugitive offenders on board German merchant vessels when calling at Southampton on their way to Germany.

In view of the opinion expressed in paragraph 1 of your report that, having regard to the principle involved, any offer by His Majesty's Government to submit the question to arbitration is to be deprecated, I have the honour, by Sir Edward Grey's direction, to invite your attention to the provisions of the Arbitration Agreement between this country and Germany of the 12th July, 1904 (Paper (A)), which agreement was renewed, by exchanges of notes, dated the 7th June and 9th July, 1909, and the 23rd November and 7th December, 1909, for a further period of five years.

fugitive criminals on German merchant-ships in British territorial waters.

By the terms of article 1 of that agreement, either of the high contracting parties has the right to claim a reference to arbitration of differences which may arise of a legal nature, or relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the contracting parties and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, unless the principle involved affects the vital interests, independence, or honour of the contracting States. The present question is certainly not a difference relating to the interpretation of treaties, and Sir E. Grey is advised that it is open to doubt whether it is a "difference of a legal nature" within the meaning of the phrase as used in the agreement. The law which is indicated appears to be, not the municipal law of either State, but the general principles of the jus commune and it seems very doubtful whether a dispute, such as the present is conceived to be, with regard to what is the municipal law of this country, can be considered as coming within the scope of the agreement. In this connexion I am to enclose a memorandum (Paper (E)) showing the circumstances in which the words "differences of a legal nature" were adopted as the translation of "différends d'ordre juridique" in the English text of the Anglo-French Arbitration Agreement of 1903, on which the Anglo-German Agreement of 1904 was based. As having a special bearing on the point, I am to call your particular attention to the facts connected with the Arbitration Convention between Brazil and Venezuela of the 30th April, 1909, which are set forth at the end of the memorandum.

It will be seen that the parties to that arbitration convention (which contained in article 1 an engagement to refer differences "of a juridical nature") subsequently exchanged notes in which it was stated that it was, "of course, understood between them that article 1 excludes from the obligatory arbitration questions which according to the territorial law must be settled by the national tribunals."

The note then proceeds as follows:—

"Even though this declaration appears unnecessary, it is convenient to state it here in writing, and to mention it later on in the act of the exchange of the ratifications of the convention referred to, in order to avoid any doubt in the future," and this explanation was included in the protocol of the exchange of ratifications of the 8th January, 1912.

Should a contention to the effect that the present dispute is not within the scope of the agreement be put forward by His Majesty's Government, but not accepted by the German Government, a question might arise as to whether the ensuing difference of opinion as to the scope of the agreement would not be a "difference of a legal nature, or relating to the interpretation of treaties," on which the German Government would be entitled to claim arbitration. In this connexion I am to enclose a copy of a report dated the 19th January, 1910, by the then Law Officers of the Crown (Paper (B)) on the subject of certain claims by the German Government arising out of the South African War, with special reference to paragraph 12 and question 3 of the reference, and to the reply to the latter. This report of your predecessors would appear to be decisive on the point suggested, should you find yourselves in agreement with it. In the event of its being necessary to refer to arbitration the question whether the present dispute is within the scope of the Anglo-German Arbitration Agreement, the facts relating to the convention between Brazil and Venezuela, as set out above, would afford a strong argument in support of the contention of His Majesty's Government.

In the present instance it is possible that a similar case of the kind now under discussion may arise at any time, and, assuming that His Majesty's Government resorted to forcible measures in order to assert their rights on board a German vessel in British waters, it is probable that the German Government would, in the first instance, protest, and in the event of such protest proving of no avail, ultimately demand a reference to arbitration. In these circumstances three courses would apparently be open to His Majesty's Government:—

1. To agree to arbitration;
2. To contend that the question did not, on a reasonable construction of the language of article 1 of the Anglo-German Arbitration Agreement, come within the scope of such agreement at all; or
3. To claim that the matter was one affecting their vital interests, independence, or honour.

It appears to Sir Edward desirable that the question should be definitely decided whether either or both of the two latter pleas would or would not be justified.

In these circumstances, before addressing any fresh communication to the German Government, Sir Edward would be glad to be favoured with your opinion on three further points:—

1. Whether the question now at issue is one which, on a reasonable construction of article 1 of the Anglo-German Arbitration Agreement of 1904, comes within the scope of such agreement at all.
2. Whether, in the event of a difference of opinion between His Majesty's Government and the German Government as to whether the question now at issue is within the scope of the arbitration agreement, such difference of opinion would be a "difference of a legal nature, or relating to the interpretation of treaties," on which the German Government would be entitled to claim arbitration.
3. Whether, in any case, the question is one which should, in no circumstances, be referred to arbitration, as involving, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, a question of the vital interests, independence, or honour of this country.

The correspondence transmitted to you on the 4th December last, together with your report of the 15th ultimo, is returned herewith for convenience of reference. (Papers (C) and (D).)

1 and 3. The principle upon which our report of the 15th March, 1912, was based is that, as a matter of international law, a sovereign State has complete control over its ports and harbours, and that it may either exclude foreign vessels altogether from entering them for the purposes of trade, or may admit them upon such terms and conditions as it may choose.

If this principle were disputed by Germany we think the difference would be a difference within the scope of the Anglo-German Arbitration Agreement of 1904, unless excluded by the proviso. The expression "difference of a legal nature" is somewhat indefinite, and might, perhaps, be construed to include more than would "contentious question of law"—the literal rendering of the German text; but the latter expression is wide enough to cover such a difference as that here supposed. In our opinion, however, a difference upon this point would be excluded from the operation of the agreement by the proviso.

It is true that, construed strictly, the proviso only excludes questions which affect the vital interests, independence, or honour of the two contracting Powers, but it is clear that the intention must have been to exclude questions of this nature, although affecting only one and not the two contracting Powers in any of the directions indicated.

The question of our right to the absolute control of our own ports and harbours is a matter which affects us in all the three ways stated, and a difference upon this point is, therefore, excluded from the scope of the agreement.

2. We are unable to concur in the opinion expressed by our predecessors to the effect that a difference as to whether a particular question was or was not within the arbitration agreement is a matter which under that agreement must itself be referred to arbitration.

We are led to this conclusion by the consideration that, if it is for the tribunal to decide whether a particular question is a "difference of a legal nature or relating to the interpretation of a treaty" within the meaning of the opening words of article 1, it must equally be for the tribunal to decide whether it affects the vital interests, independence, or honour of the objecting country within the meaning of the proviso—a result which cannot have been intended. Moreover, the provisions of article 2 point to the conclusion that the functions of the tribunal are only to be called into operation when both Powers agree that there is a question which under the treaty is to be submitted to arbitration.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 22, 1912.

I HAVE the honour to transmit to you herewith, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, the papers enclosed relating to the draft of a "Persian Coast and Islands (Amendment) Order in Council," which has been rendered necessary by the desirability of defining more strictly the districts comprised in the "Persian Coast and Islands Order" of 1907, and excluded from the Persian Order in Council of 1889.

The preparation of this draft order has been delayed by the consideration of a scheme for a new comprehensive Order in Council, embracing the whole Persian Gulf; this scheme has now been abandoned.

The draft has been approved by the Secretary of State for India in Council.

I am to request you to take the draft Order in Council into your consideration, and to favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval. Sir E. Grey will also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general nature which you may desire to offer on the papers now submitted to you.

I have, &c.

Draft Persian Coast and Islands (Amendment) Order in Council.

Whereas by treaty, grant, usage, sufferance, and other lawful means, His Majesty the King has power and jurisdiction within the dominions of His Majesty the Shah of Persia, and

Whereas the exercise of such jurisdiction is at present regulated by "The Persia Order in Council, 1889," and "The Persian Coast and Islands Order in Council, 1907," and

Whereas it is desirable more strictly to define the limits within which "The Persian Coast and Islands Order in Council, 1907," applies:

Now, therefore, His Majesty, by virtue and in exercise of the powers in this behalf by "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," or otherwise, in His Majesty vested, is pleased, by and with the advice of His Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, as follows:—

1. Article 2 of "The Persian Coast and Islands Order in Council, 1907," is hereby repealed, and the following article is substituted therefor: "The limits of this order are Mohammerah with its dependencies, the coast, and maritime provinces of Persia from Mohammerah to Gwettur, both inclusive, and the islands of the Persian Gulf and Gulf of Oman, being within the dominions of His Majesty the Shah of Persia, including the territorial waters of Persia adjacent to the said coast and islands.

"Mohammerah with its dependencies includes all places within the territory geographically known as Arabistan.

"The term 'the maritime provinces of Persia' means the provinces of Arabistan, Fars, Laristan, Karman, Persian Baluchistan, and those districts by custom and for the time being included under the authority of the Persian Governor of the Gulf ports."

2. This order may be cited as "The Persian Coast and Islands (Amendment) Order in Council, 1912," and shall be read as one with "The Persian Coast and Islands Order in Council, 1907."

And the Most Honourable the Marquess of Crewe, K.G., and the Right Honourable Sir Edward Grey, Baronet, two of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, are to give the necessary directions herein as to them may respectively appertain.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 21, 1912.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list, from which it appears that the expansion of the note circulation of the Imperial Bank of Persia has a tendency rapidly to progress, and that the question has of late engaged the serious consideration of the Board of Directors of the Bank, who are endeavouring to determine the extent to which such expansion may be carried out.

Sir Edward Grey is advised that the opinion given by the Bank's Solicitors to the effect that, assuming the requisite notice has been given to the Persian Government under Article 3 of the Concession, the Bank may properly carry out a contemplated increase of the issue and circulation of notes in Persia up to a total amount of 1,300,000*l.*, provided that the amount of the metallic reserve held against such issue be maintained at the proportion of 50 per cent. of the amount of notes issued and in circulation, which in such a case would be 650,000*l.*, equal to the amount of the paid-up capital of the Bank, is correct.

In view, however, of the importance to His Majesty's Government that the Charter of the Imperial Bank should not be jeopardized, Sir E. Grey would be glad to have the benefit of your opinion, and I therefore have the honour to request you to be so good as to take the papers into your consideration, and to favour him with your opinion as to whether the Imperial Bank of Persia may, under the terms of their Concession and Deed of Settlement, issue notes to the equivalent of 1,300,000*l.*, provided that they keep a metallic reserve against this issue of 50 per cent., say 650,000*l.*, whereby the difference between the metallic reserve and the notes so issued will not exceed the paid-up capital of the Bank, namely, 650,000*l.*

I have, &c.

Report.

The proposal to increase the issue of notes to a total of 1,300,000*l.* against a metallic reserve of 650,000*l.*—the paid-up capital of the Bank being 650,000*l.*—is within the powers of the Bank so far as the Concession and Deed of Settlement are concerned. But Article 3 (b) of the Charter contains the provision that the difference between the metallic reserve and the amount of notes in circulation is not to exceed the amount of the Company's paid-up capital "after deduction of the amount which, in pursuance of the Deed of Settlement hereinafter mentioned, is to be paid for the acquisition of the said Concession." The provisions for the transfer of the Concession are contained in Articles 6 and 7 of the Deed of Settlement, but we are not aware whether anything was paid thereunder. If any payment was made, the amount thereof must be deducted from the 1,300,000*l.* proposed as the amount of the issue in order to make the issue comply with article 3 of the Charter.

Memorandum.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs is anxious to be favoured, with the least possible delay, with the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown on the following matter:—

During the war between Turkey and Italy certain Turkish gun-boats, which were in the Port of Suez, were given notice to leave in 24 hours by the Egyptian authorities. They failed to do so, and were therefore interned and disarmed, in pursuance of the obligations which rested upon Egypt in consequence of her being considered and treated, in spite of her special relations to Turkey, as a neutral Power. Turkey being now at peace with Italy, but at war with Greece, the Greek chargé d'affaires has asked officially that the gun-boats may continue to be interned without being given an opportunity to leave the Egyptian port. For the purposes of this reference it may be taken that Turkey was at war with Greece before she was at peace with Italy, and therefore her state of belligerency against either one power or the other was continuous.

Turkish gun-boats interned in Egypt during Turco-
Italian war:
Request of Greek Government that they be not liberated.

Three questions thus present themselves:—

1. Are the gun-boats now entitled to an opportunity of leaving the Egyptian port, should they desire to do so?
2. If they are entitled to leave, should their armament be previously returned to them by the Egyptian authorities?
3. If they are entitled to leave, it is presumed that the proper course would be for the Egyptian authorities to give them notice to do so within 24 hours. If so, from what time should the 24 hours run?

As to (1), it may be argued, in support of a refusal to allow the gun-boats an opportunity of leaving, that they were originally interned and disarmed because they belonged to a belligerent Power. Turkey is still, and has not ceased to be, a belligerent, and it is a matter of indifference with whom Turkey is at war; what matters is that she is at war, and her status as a belligerent is in no way changed owing to the fact that she was at first fighting Italy, was then for a short time fighting both Italy and Greece, and is now fighting Greece, but not Italy.

On the other side it may be urged that the gun-boats were originally interned because they were national ships of a Power which was at war with Italy. When that war came to an end, they were prima facie entitled to depart. But at that moment a new war was in progress between Turkey and Greece, and it may be claimed that Egypt was then a Power which had been informed of the outbreak of hostilities between Turkey and Greece, and found Turkish war-ships in her ports, and that therefore her proper course was, in accordance with the usual practice which is now embodied in article 13 of The Hague Convention, No. 13 of the 18th October, 1907, to give them notice to leave within 24 hours.

As to (2) it may be said, that if the Egyptian authorities were to return the armament, they would be adding to their fighting force, and if Egypt permitted such addition to be made in her ports, and in effect armed belligerent war-ships, she would be guilty of a breach of neutrality.

On the other hand it may be argued that if the Egyptian authorities merely restore the gun-boats to their original condition at the time when they were interned, with reference to the war then existing merely placing on board what was removed probably for convenience in guarding them, they would not be increasing their armaments within the true meaning of the term. The fighting capacity which must not be increased is the fighting capacity with which the belligerent vessel entered the port.

As to (3), the question would appear to be whether the 24 hours should have run from the conclusion of peace between Turkey and Italy, or should be reckoned from the time when notice to leave is given by the Egyptian authorities. If it is considered that the vessels are entitled to have their armaments returned, the further question arises whether these should not be replaced before the period of 24 hours begins to run.

Opinion of Law Officers of the Crown respecting Turkish Gun-boats disarmed and interned by Egypt.

(1.) We are of opinion that the Turkish gun-boats are not entitled to an opportunity of leaving Egypt. It is the right and duty of a neutral to intern the war-ships of a belligerent, unless such ships depart within the time prescribed. These gun-boats were given the opportunity to depart when Turkey became a belligerent, and since that date Turkey has continued to be at war. It is immaterial that the enemy which Turkey is fighting has changed, so long as the Turkish gun-boats have uninterruptedly continued to be the war-ships of a belligerent. This we think is the real effect of article 12 of The Hague Convention; it is, moreover, consistent with principle.

(2) and (3). These questions do not now arise, but, we may add, that if (contrary to our view) the Turkish gun-boats were entitled to another opportunity of leaving Egypt, they would in our opinion be entitled to have their armaments restored to them, and to be treated in all respects as though there had never been any Turco-Italian war.

[March 19, 1912.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, January 12, 1912.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you herewith the papers noted in the accompanying list on the question of advantages which may be accorded by the United States' Government to American shipping using the Panamá Canal, and the compatibility of any of the schemes, which have been proposed with this end in view, with the obligations of the United States' Government under the treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom of the 18th November, 1901, commonly known as the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty.

Preferential treatment of United States' vessels using the Panamá Canal.

2. The article in the treaty of the 18th November, 1901, which directly governs the question now being discussed is article 3, which provides, inter alia, that "the Canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise."

3. The proposals which have been made in the United States for according preferential treatment to United States' shipping using the Panamá Canal fall into two classes—those relating to the coastwise traffic of the United States, i.e., to vessels plying from one United States' port to another, and those of a more general nature.

4. In considering the first class of proposals, it is to be borne in mind that by the present laws of the United States the coasting traffic, both in goods and in passengers between two United States' ports, is restricted to vessels built in the United States and flying the American flag.

5. It has been proposed to exempt altogether United States' mercantile vessels plying from one American port to another from payment of any dues or tolls in the Canal. This proposal would, on the face of it, appear to be inconsistent with the provisions of the article of the treaty quoted above. It is, however, defended on the ground that as foreign vessels cannot compete in coastwise traffic with those of the United States no injury is inflicted upon them, because they are out of the traffic altogether, and therefore not prejudiced. In reply to this contention, it may be urged, first, that in the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty no exception was made for United States' coastwise vessels, an exception which ought to have been made, if it was intended to qualify the full generality of the expression cited above; and, further, that it might well happen that this provision could be used to secure traffic from places outside the United States, either to United States' ports in the Pacific or to other ports, in some such manner as the following: Shippers of goods from Atlantic ports outside the United States to Pacific ports in the United States might be induced by the offer of favourable terms by the managers of United States' lines engaged in the coasting trade to send their goods to a United States' Atlantic port for transshipment into a United States' vessel passing through the Canal. Foreign lines would thus lose the profits to be gained on taking the goods the whole distance, while the coasting trade of the United States might be greatly stimulated at their expense. If the destination of the goods were a Pacific port outside the United States the goods might be taken through the Canal in a United States' vessel paying no tolls and transhipped at Panamá into some other vessel proceeding to the foreign port. A United States' vessel might even take the goods on board at the foreign port whence they were sent, and, after first touching at an Atlantic port in the United States, be considered as engaged in the coasting trade, and so be allowed to pass through the Canal without paying tolls. In this case, foreign shipping would suffer even more serious damage. The possibility of such practices being adopted shows that the exemption of United States' coastwise traffic might in effect prejudice foreign shipping and infringe the principle of equality laid down in the treaty.

6. The United States' Government would perhaps, if this point were taken, offer to make rules, providing that United States' vessels should forfeit their exemption if they carried cargo for foreign ports, but such provisions would be difficult to enforce or could be easily defeated by evasion, so that the mischief apprehended could not be fully averted.

7. The above considerations apply in the case of exemption of coastwise traffic from the payment of dues. It is evident that the arguments against such exemption in the case of United States' vessels generally are considerably stronger, in view of the stipulations of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty.

8. A second plan, which has been suggested for giving some special benefit to United States' shipping, is, while maintaining equality of tolls for all vessels passing through the Canal, to refund to United States' vessels such tolls as they may have paid. Such a scheme might be held to respect the treaty in letter, but to break it in spirit. On the other hand, it might be urged that such a refund would be equivalent to a bounty; that any country may offer bounties to its shipping, or to some particular line of shipping engaged in a particular trade; and that the United States could not be expected to refrain from paying the dues for its shipping if other countries do so.

9. An argument against the right to exempt United States' vessels from the payment of dues or to refund the tolls may be found in the fact that any remission of tolls, whether limited to one class of or extended to all United States' vessels, might throw an increased burden, in respect of the charges for the upkeep of the Canal, upon shipping not so favoured, which would consequently be called upon to pay more than the fair rates necessary to make the Canal self-supporting. This argument may, however, be difficult to sustain at present, in view of the possibility of the tolls being fixed at a level below that which would make the Canal, at any rate for a certain period of time, a self-supporting enterprise. It would in this case in all probability be difficult to show that an extra burden was laid on foreign shipping, and not merely on the United States' Treasury, by the remission of tolls in favour of United States' vessels.

10. Sir E. Grey would be glad if you would consider the proposals discussed above and in the papers enclosed herein, and would furnish him at your early convenience with your opinion as to whether, and, if so, how far they are, or any of them is, compatible with the provisions of the treaty of the 18th November, 1901, between this country and the United States.

11. Another point in connection with the question of the Panamá Canal is raised in a despatch from His Majesty's consul-general in New York, a copy of which also accompanies this letter.

12. Mr. Bennett states that there is scarcely any doubt that when the Canal is completed the United States' Government will hold that trade between American ports and ports in the Canal Zone is American coastwise trade, and is, as such, closed to foreign ships.

13. By the convention of the 18th November, 1903, between the United States and the Republic of Panamá, the United States' Government were granted a lease in perpetuity of the zone traversed by the Canal.

14. A copy of the convention is transmitted herewith. It does not appear that the actual sovereignty over the zone was made over to the United States, and it seems to Sir E. Grey to be very doubtful whether the United States' Government have the power, under the terms of the convention, to declare that ports in the zone are to be considered as American ports for the purposes of the coasting trade.

15. Sir E. Grey would be glad to be favoured with your opinion on this question also, and with any observations of a more general nature which you may be good enough to offer on the whole subject.

Report.

1. That with reference to the suggestion that all American vessels should be allowed free passage of the Panamá Canal and to the alternative suggestion that the tolls paid by them should be repaid by the Government, we consider that there is no difference in principle between changing tolls only to refund them and remitting tolls altogether. The result is the same in either case, and the only object of adopting the first method of freeing the ships in question from the tolls in preference to the second must be to attempt to comply with the letter of the treaty whilst contravening its spirit. In our opinion, the argument which seeks to justify a refund of tolls by saying that it amounts merely to a subsidy and that there is nothing in the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty which limits the right of the United States to subsidise its shipping is unsound. It is true that there is nothing in the treaty to prevent the United States' Government from subsidising its shipping, and if it chose to grant a subsidy His Majesty's Government would not be in a position to complain. But there is a great distinction between a general subsidy, either to shipping at large or to shipping engaged in any given trade, and a subsidy calculated particularly with reference to the amount of user of the Canal by the subsidised lines or vessels. If such a subsidy were granted it would, in our opinion, stand self-confessed as a colourable attempt to avoid the obligations of the treaty. It follows that either of the suggestions in question, if adopted, would involve an infraction of the treaty.

2. As to the proposal that exemption should be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, we think a more difficult question arises. If the trade could be so regulated as to make it certain that only traffic which under the United States' law is reserved for United States' vessels would be benefited by the exemption, it is not easy to see upon what ground objection could be taken. But it appears to us that this proposal may be combated, on the ground that it would be impossible to frame regulations which would prevent the exemption from resulting, in fact, in a preference to United States' shipping and consequently in an infraction of the treaty.

3. As to the suggested intention of the United States' Government to declare ports in the Canal Zone American ports for the purpose of the rule as to coastwise traffic, a distinction is to be drawn between ports in the Canal and those which, whilst in the Canal Zone, are not in the Canal. As to the latter, although actual sovereignty is not vested in the United States, yet the treaty with Panamá gives them all the rights and powers which actual sovereignty would confer, and it cannot be said that the United States would not be justified in declaring that these should be considered American ports for the purpose of coastwise trade. Ports in the Canal itself, however, would come within the stipulations of article 4 of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, and could not be declared to be American ports.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 22, 1912.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to submit to you herewith a copy of a Bill, at present before the Congress of the United States, to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panamá Canal.

You have already, in your report of the 19th March, furnished Sir E. Grey with your views as to whether the provision now embodied in article 5 of this Bill, for the purpose of benefiting United States' shipping, is compatible with the obligations of the United States' Government under article 3 of the treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom of the 18th November, 1901, commonly known as the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, which provides, inter alia, that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the condition or charges of traffic or otherwise."

I am now to call your attention to the further provision contained in article 11 of this Bill, which, as amended, limits in various particulars the liberty of using the canal in the case of ships owned or controlled by railroad companies. Having regard to the fact that a substantial proportion of Canadian shipping is owned by railway companies, and that it has been argued that for certain purposes Canadian railway companies whose operations extend to the United States are within the scope of the Inter-State Commerce Act, referred to in the present Bill as "the Act to regulate commerce approved February 4th, 1887," Sir E. Grey will be glad to learn whether in your opinion the proposed restrictions to be placed on vessels owned by railway companies could be held, if applied to such Canadian vessels, to be a breach of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty above mentioned. A copy of the treaty is also enclosed herewith.

Report.

In our opinion, section 11 of the Panamá Canal Bill refers only to United States' vessels which are entitled to engage in coastwise trade between ports of the United States, and has no application to Canadian vessels.

If it did apply to Canadian vessels the section would, in our opinion, involve an infraction of article 3 (1) of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty. This clause forbids discrimination between the subjects of any nation as well as discrimination between one nation and another, and so prevents special restrictions being imposed upon a special class of owners. The canal is to be free and open to the vessels of commerce of all nations, and a provision excluding certain vessels of commerce, even though applied regardless of the vessels' nationality, would not be in accordance with the treaty.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 17, 1912.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you the papers noted in the annexed list, and to request you to furnish him with your opinion on the following point:—

For many years past the United States' Government have been much alarmed at the rapid diminution in numbers of the fur seals on the Pribiloff Islands in the Behring Sea. This diminution has been chiefly ascribed to pelagic sealing, that is to say, to the killing of the seals on the high seas outside any territorial jurisdiction.

UNITED STATES.

With a view to preserve the seal herd the United States' Government have restricted the number of seals allowed to be killed annually on the islands, which form part of the United States' territory, but they have until recently been unable, except by means of international agreements, to secure any restriction of pelagic sealing which is chiefly carried on by Canadian and Japanese sealers.

It should be observed that the seals also frequent other islands in the Behring Sea within the jurisdiction of Japan and Russia, but that there are no islands within the dominion of Canada to which the seals resort. Canadian sealers are therefore unable to take seals, except by means of pelagic sealing.

The United States' Government consequently saw that, in order to secure the total suspension of pelagic sealing, they must first obtain the discontinuance of that form of sealing by Canadian sealers. They would then be in a position to approach Japan and Russia, which Powers were interested both in pelagic sealing and as owners of islands frequented by seals.

The Canadian Government refused to surrender the incontestable right of Canadian sealers to take seals on the high seas, except in return for suitable compensation.

Negotiations over the question of compensation were carried on for some years until finally a treaty (Paper (A)) was signed by the United States' Government and His Majesty's Government (on behalf of Canada) on the 7th February, 1911, under which both Powers undertook to prohibit pelagic sealing by their respective subjects and citizens.

In return the United States' Government undertook to hand over to the Canadian Government one-fifth in number and value of the seal-skins taken on the Pribiloff Islands. But as the United States' Government were contemplating the temporary suspension of the killing of seals on the islands, it was also provided that they should pay to His Majesty's Government the sum of 200,000 dollars "as an advance payment in lieu of such number of fur-seal skins, to which Great Britain would be entitled under the provisions of this treaty, as would be equivalent to that amount reckoned at their market value at London at the date of delivery, before dressing or curing and less cost of transportation from the Pribiloff Islands" and the United States' Government were to retain the one-fifth share of the annual catch due to Canada until they had recouped themselves for the 200,000 dollars advanced.

In the draft of that treaty as originally agreed upon with the United States' Government the place where the market value of the seal-skins was to be calculated was left blank. The word "London" was inserted at the suggestion of the Canadian Government (see Paper (B)) for the reason apparently that London was and still is the chief seal-skin market of the world.

Shortly after the signature of the treaty of the 7th February the United States' Government issued invitations to His Majesty's, the Russian and Japanese Governments to send representatives to a conference at Washington to discuss further measures for the preservation of the seal herds in the Behring Sea.

The conference assembled on the 11th May, 1911. His Majesty's Government were represented by Mr. Bryce, His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington, and Mr. Pope (for Canada), assisted by Messrs. Poland and Fraser as expert representatives of the seal-skin industry in England.

Prior to the first meeting Mr. Poland urged upon Mr. Bryce the desirability of doing whatever could be done to retain the industry of dressing and curing the skins in London, and to frustrate the alleged efforts of the United States' administration to transfer it to the United States.

Mr. Bryce observed (see Paper (C)) "that as the matter need not arise on any of the United States' proposals, it is doubtful whether any opportunity will arise for taking such action, and that it is not clear what form of proceeding would be possible to secure it. Something, perhaps, as much as was possible, has been done in getting the London market price specifically recognised in the treaty as the standard valuation of skins. Though Canada or His Majesty's Government will retain control of one-fifth of the skins, the United States will be able, as they always have been able, to send their much larger share to whatever market they please. As to whether they could under the terms of the treaty also divert from the London market the Canadian fifth share for as long as it is retained in reimbursement of the advance of 200,000 dollars, is a question which will require careful consideration subsequently. That substitution of a sum for the first skins had been made necessary by the wish of Canada to have a sum down paid to her. The attempt artificially to transfer the industry to the United States, of which I had information from various sources, had, however, already failed once and might well fail again. Rumour says that it originated largely in the connexion of Mr. Nagel, secretary of commerce and labour and president of the conference, with St. Louis, a place which was particularly anxious to acquire the industry. The most favourable circumstances for such a transfer would arise if the hold of London on the business were broken by a suspension of the land catch. Probably such suspension would not be resorted to until the effect of the cessation of pelagic sealing was ascertained."

The Washington conference led to the signature on the 7th July, 1911, of a treaty (Paper (D)) by His Majesty's Government, the United States', Russian and Japanese Governments whereby each Power undertook to prohibit pelagic sealing by its nationals. The Powers owning islands frequented by the seal herds also undertook to compensate the other Powers for the suspension of pelagic sealing.

Article 11, providing for payment of compensation by the United States to Great Britain (for Canada) and Japan is, mutatis mutandis, identical with the compensation article in the treaty of the 7th February, 1911 (Paper (A)), and London is again taken as the market where the value of the skins is to be reckoned.

There is no mention in the protocols of the conference of the reasons for the selection of London. The only references to this point in the correspondence with His Majesty's Embassy at Washington are those contained in the Papers (C) and (F) transmitted herewith.

On the 16th November, 1911, His Majesty's consul at Philadelphia reported (Paper (E)) that proposals were under consideration for the diversion of the seal-skin market from London to the United States.

Mr. Bryce was asked to furnish his observations on the report, and replied by sending home a memorandum by the First Secretary to His Majesty's Embassy at Washington (Paper (F)) to the following effect:—

"The possibility of the United States' Government renewing their efforts to establish a wholesale trade in the United States which would enable them to market the Alaskan skins there instead of sending them to London was kept in view at the recent conference in Washington. Nothing could be done directly to hinder this, although the expert representatives of the trade here were privately sounded as to whether they would be prepared to make any outlay on securing the interests of the London business should a means be found of doing so. They were not willing to do anything of this nature, and so the most that could be done was to get the London market recognised in the treaty as fixing the price for purposes of compensation to Canada.

"But there is reason to believe that the Department of Commerce and Labour fully realise the risk of serious loss of revenue involved in transferring the wholesale market to the United States. The market here would be much smaller, as continental buyers would probably not attend, and prices would be lower—in fact, could probably be kept low by combination. The skins would anyhow go for some time to London to be dressed and dyed. As during the years 1899–1910 only 957 raw skins were shipped to the United States as against 209,522 dressed ones, it would seem that there is no sufficient skilled industry in this country to supply the demand. Moreover, the price largely depends on the skilled sorting of the skins into various grades, which requires a centralisation of the whole annual supply at some one spot.

"The saving of the customs duty of 20 per cent. by dressing and dyeing in the United States is not an argument likely to appeal to the United States' Government.

"Since the expiration of the lease to the company the United States' Government have marketed their skins in London through Messrs. Lampson. There seems to be no reason at present to fear that the efforts to upset this arrangement on the part of St. Louis will prevail against those of the New York fur merchants to maintain it. But, in any case, we can do nothing to prevent such a change."

The Board of Trade, to which department the report of His Majesty's consul at Philadelphia was also sent, propounded the view (Paper (G)) that the United States' Government are bound by Article 11 of the treaty of the 7th July, 1911 (Paper (D)), to send the whole of their catch of seal-skins to London (at least until such time as the compensation due to Canada becomes payable in skins instead of in cash) with a view to the proper determination of the London market value of the skins.

Sir E. Grey was advised that such an interpretation of article 11 of the treaty could not be maintained and the Board were so informed (Paper (G)).

In reply the Board furnished further arguments in support of their view (Paper (H)), and repeated their suggestion that the matter should be referred to you.

Sir E. Grey is fully alive to the loss which would be inflicted upon the trade of this country if the United States succeeded in transferring to that country the industry of dressing and preparing the seal-skins, and to the advantage which would accrue if article 11 of the treaty could be held to oblige the United States to send to London the catch of skins so long as the first paragraph of article 11 was in operation, and in view of the arguments put forward by the Board of Trade he would be glad to learn whether in your opinion the treaty can be so construed as to oblige the United States' Government until such time as they shall have recouped themselves for the 200,000 dollars advance payment to Canada to sell all their skins in London. He would also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer.

Report.

In our opinion it is impossible to contend that article 11 of the treaty of the 7th July, 1911, imports an obligation upon the United States of America to send to the London market the whole of the seal-skins taken from the American herd until such time as the United States' Government shall have recouped themselves for the advance payment of 200,000 dollars.

The utmost that could be contended is that the treaty imports an obligation in respect of the British and Japanese shares, viz., 30 per cent. in number and value of the total. The argument would be that this obligation arises by implication from the provision that the number of skins to be retained by the United States of America is to be reckoned by reference to "their market value at London at the date of their delivery and less cost of transport from the Pribiloff Islands." This argument is no doubt supported by the circumstance that the words "date of their delivery" suggest an actual delivery in London, and the application of these words is obscure unless the British and Japanese share of skins are, in fact, sent to London. If the fixing of this date is essential to the agreement, this might bring the case within the proposition of law, that where one party enters into an arrangement which can only take effect by the continuance of a certain state of circumstances, there is an implied engagement on his part that he shall do nothing of his own motion to put an end to that state of circumstances in which alone the agreement can be operative.

There is no provision in the treaty which would support the argument that the United States of America are obliged to continue to send a 70 per cent. balance of skins to London. The utmost that could be contended would be that this obligation exists in respect of the 30 per cent. We do not, however, feel at all confident that this view would prevail even as to the 30 per cent., but we indicate the above argument as being the best way of putting the contention so far as it will go.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 9, 1913.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit herewith the draft of an Order in Council to be called "The Abyssinia Order in Council, 1913," which has been prepared in this Department for the purpose of regularising the exercise of His Majesty's extra-territorial jurisdiction in Abyssinia. Abyssinia Order in Council, 1913.

The draft follows the general lines of "The Persia Order in Council, 1889," which seemed to afford the best precedent in view of the local conditions. It provides for the application of Indian law in view of the fact that the majority of the civil and commercial cases in Abyssinia concern British Indian subjects.

I am to request you to take the draft Order into your consideration, and to favour Sir Edward Grey with your opinion as to whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval. Sir Edward will also be glad if you will indicate such amendments and modifications (if any) in the draft as you may consider necessary or desirable, and will add any observations on it of a general nature which you may wish to offer.

I have, &c.

W. LANGLEY.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

[38589]

No. 2.

[File 9689/13.]

[August 20, 1913.]

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, May 31, 1913.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to inform you that, in connexion with the Navigation Bill recently passed by the Parliament of the Australian Commonwealth, and now reserved for His Majesty's pleasure, the question has been raised as to the extent to which Austria-Hungary is entitled, in virtue of the Anglo-Austrian Treaty of the 30th April, 1868, to take part in the coasting trade of the Commonwealth, and incidentally in the coasting trade of certain others of the self-governing Dominions. Copies of the treaty and of the Navigation Bill above referred to are enclosed herewith.

2. Article 1 of the treaty, in its first paragraph, provides for the grant to Austrian and Hungarian merchant ships of the same treatment as national ships. In the second paragraph provision is made for most-favoured-nation treatment also. Article 2 applies the provisions of Article 1 to the British colonies and foreign possessions, but limits it, in the case of the coasting trade, to "those colonies and foreign possessions the coasting trade of which shall have been, or shall hereafter be, opened to foreign ships, in conformity with the Acts of Parliament which govern the matter." In the second paragraph of the article it is stated that the foreign possessions and colonies, the coasting trade of which had been already so opened to foreign ships, and in which therefore the ships belonging to Austro-Hungarian subjects were placed on the national footing, were British India, Ceylon, Cape of Good Hope, Victoria, and St. Lucia.

3. The main purpose of Article 1 appears to be, on the British side, to give national treatment to Austrian and Hungarian ships throughout the Empire, without reservation, for the period of the currency of the treaty, but the addition of most-favoured-nation treatment, certainly in the case of the United Kingdom, is wholly unmeaning, and the second paragraph appears to have been added without any due consideration of the context. From the general grant a special derogation is then made in the case of fisheries.

4. The main purpose of Article 2 appears to be to make a further exception from the general grant of national treatment in the case of the coasting trade in the colonies. The article begins by applying both paragraph 1 (national treatment) and paragraph 2 (most-favoured-nation treatment) to the colonies, thus importing into Article 2 the confusion existing in Article 1. National treatment has, however, already been granted in all His Majesty's dominions by Article 1 to Austrian and Hungarian ships generally, and unless the article is mere repetition, it must be intended to qualify the application of Article 1. The most reasonable interpretation would seem to be that it confers most-favoured-nation treatment in the colonial coasting trade, a view which is supported by the references, not to Austrian or Hungarian, but to foreign ships. The last paragraph of Article 2, therefore, records that Austrian and Hungarian ships are entitled, in British India, &c., to the treatment which other foreign nations have, under the Acts referred to, received, viz., national treatment.

5. If it had been intended that the opening of the coasting trade of a colony to foreign ships should operate so as to place such coasting trade, for the purposes of the treaty, on the same footing as the coasting trade of the United Kingdom, it is not clear (a) why article 2 was not drawn so as to run as follows: "But as regards the coasting trade only in British India, Ceylon, &c., and in any other colonies and foreign possessions, the coasting trade of which shall be hereafter opened to foreign ships, &c.," nor (b) why, if it is possible to hold that the purpose of the application of the provisions of Article 1 to the colonial coasting trade was to involve the grant of national plus most-favoured-nation treatment, there is no reference to most-favoured-nation treatment in the description of the position as regards the coasting trade of British India, &c. It may be pointed out that the opening of the coasting trade of a colony to foreign ships (vide section 328 of the Imperial Act of 1853, quoted in paragraph 13, infra), did not necessarily involve the grant of national rights, and it is difficult to suppose that it was the intention to give Austrian and Hungarian ships more favourable treatment than other foreign ships. The treaty contains, of course, no guarantee that other foreign ships would be accorded any particular treatment for any particular period. On this interpretation, therefore, the effect of Article 2 was merely to guarantee to Austrian and Hungarian ships such rights in the colonial coasting trade as might be granted to other foreign ships for the period during which such rights were in force.

6. This interpretation of the Article in question appears to be borne out by the history of the procedure in Canada. In 1868 the coasting trade of the recently formed Dominion of Canada—then including Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick—had not been opened to foreign ships, as section 163 of "The Customs Consolidation Act, 1853," was still in force, and by that section it was provided that no goods or passengers might be carried from one port of any British possession in America to another port of the same possession except in British ships. The provisions of this Act were dealt with by "The Merchant Shipping (Colonial) Act, 1869," which repealed section 163 as from the date in the case of each British possession at which either an Act or Ordinance with respect to the coasting trade made within two years after the commencement of the Act of 1869 in such British possession came into operation, or, if there were no such Act or Ordinance, at which the said two years expired. The Act of 1869 was to be proclaimed in every British possession by the Governor as soon as might be after he received notice of the Act, and was to come into operation on the day of proclamation. The Act contained in section 7 provision that in the construction of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854," and of the Acts amending that Act, Canada should be deemed to be one British possession. The term "Canada" is presumably applied only to the Dominion of Canada as then existing, as "Canada" was not at that time a collective term for British North America.

7. In virtue of the authority given by the Imperial Act of 1869, the Parliament of Canada, by cap. 14, 33 Vict., reciting the authority of that statute, provided that no goods or passengers could be carried coastwise in Canada except in British ships, but it was also provided that the Governor-in-Council might declare that the terms of the Act should not apply to the ships or vessels of any foreign country in which British ships were admitted to the coasting trade of the country, and, in addition, an express saving was made of any Treaty rights made before the passing of the Act of 1869. In virtue of the authority contained in this Act, an Order-in-Council was enacted on the 1st June, 1876, by which the ships of the Austro-Hungarian Empire were admitted to the coasting trade on the same conditions as Canadian vessels. Similar Orders-in-Council were made with regard to the vessels of Italy (13th October, 1873), the vessels of Germany (14th May, 1874), the vessels of the Netherlands (5th November, 1874), the vessels of Sweden and Norway (5th November, 1874), the vessels of Denmark (25th January, 1877), the vessels of Belgium (13th September, 1879), and the vessels of the Argentine Republic (10th May, 1881).

8. By an Order-in-Council of the 13th January, 1908, these Orders-in-Council were repealed on, from, and after the 1st January, 1909, and the ships and vessels referred to thus became subject to the terms of section 955 of Chapter 113 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, which provided that goods or passengers may only be carried by water from one port of Canada to another in British ships.

9. By an Order-in-Council of the 17th December, 1908, the Order-in-Council of the 13th January, 1908, was revoked, and the ships of the country concerned were made subject to the provisions of sections 952-957 of the Canada Shipping Act, prohibiting foreign ships from engaging in the coasting trade of Canada, but with a proviso admitting steamships of not less than 1,500 gross tonnage of Italy, Germany, the Netherlands, Sweden and Norway, Austria-Hungary, Denmark, Belgium, the Argentine Republic, and Japan to the coasting trade between any port in the province of Nova Scotia and any port in the province of Quebec until the 31st December, 1911. This has been extended by Order-in-Council of the 8th December, 1911, to the 31st December, 1913.

10. Another Order-in-Council of the 31st December, 1908, allowed the steamships of foreign countries which were under charter to engage in the coasting trade in the maritime provinces until the 1st July, 1909.

11. By an Order-in-Council of the 9th December, 1909, it was ordered that, despite anything contained in the Order-in-Council of the 17th December, 1908, vessels of Italy, Germany, the Netherlands, Sweden, Norway, Austria-Hungary, Denmark, Belgium, the Argentine Republic, and Japan should be admitted to the coasting trade of Canada for the carrying of goods between Atlantic provinces and any port on the Pacific Coast of Canada, on the same conditions as Canadian vessels, until the 31st December, 1911. This has not been extended so far as appears.

12. It will be seen from these facts that the Canadian Parliament and Government have assumed that the throwing open of the coasting trade of the Dominion of Canada to Austrian and Hungarian ships which took place on the 1st June, 1876, has in no way bound Canada to maintain the opening of the trade despite the existence of the Treaty of 1868. No protest has been made by the Austro-Hungarian Government against the action taken by Canada in this matter, although Austrian and Hungarian ships are directly affected.

13. In the case of Australia, in 1868 the coasting trade of Victoria had been opened to foreign vessels by an Imperial Order-in-Council of the 24th June, 1856, made in virtue of the authority given by section 328 of the Act of 1853, which provides as follows:—

"If the Legislature or proper legislative authority of any of the British possessions abroad shall present an address to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to authorise or permit the conveyance of goods or passengers from one part of such possession to another part thereof in other than British ships, or if the Legislatures of any two or more possessions, which for the purposes of this Act Her Majesty in Council shall declare to be neighbouring possessions, shall present addresses or a joint address to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to place the trade between them on the footing of a coasting trade, or of otherwise regulating the same, so far as relates to the vessels in which it is to be carried on, it shall thereupon be lawful for Her Majesty by Order-in-Council, so to authorise the conveyance of such goods or passengers, or so to regulate the trade between such neighbouring possessions, as the case may be, on such terms and under such conditions as to Her Majesty may seem good."

The text of the Order-in-Council will be found in Hertslet's "Treaties," vol. x, p. 432.

14. The coasting trade of the other Australian Colonies was not thrown open until the passing of the Act of 1869, under which the coasting trade automatically became open within two years after the commencement of the Act in the absence of any legislation reimposing restrictions on the engagement of foreign vessels in that trade.

15. It would appear, therefore, that on the analogy of the case of Canada there is no obligation on the Commonwealth Government to keep open the coasting trade of the Commonwealth so far as it concerns the trade between any two ports in any of the five States of New South Wales, Queensland, South Australia, Western Australia, and Tasmania. The northern territory of Australia was formerly part of the State of South Australia, and there seems no reason on Treaty grounds on which the Government could be required to open the coasting trade of the territory to Austrian and Hungarian ships. In the case of Victoria a different question arises, namely, whether the express mention of that Colony (now State) in paragraph 2 of Article 2 of the Treaty prevents steps being taken for the closing of the coasting trade, but, on the argument indicated above, it would seem that there is no sufficient ground for regarding the grant as being irrevocable, that is to say, while most-favoured-nation treatment must be assigned to Austrian and Hungarian ships it is not necessary that as regards the coasting trade national treatment should be accorded.

16. In the case of the Union of South Africa, the coasting trade of the Cape of Good Hope was opened by Order-in-Council made on the 7th December, 1855, in virtue of section 328 of the Imperial Act of 1853 (vide "Hertslet's Treaties," vol. x, p. 405). The trade was therefore open in 1868, but it would seem that after the repeal of section 328 of the Act of 1853 the coasting trade of the Cape was again closed in view of the express terms of section 163 which confined the coasting trade of the British possessions in Africa to British ships. It does not appear, however, that this was held at the time to be the case, for a Cape Act, No. 26 of 1872 (vide "Hertslet's Treaties," vol. xv, p. 722) threw open the coasting trade to foreign ships generally "subject to the provisions of any Act of the Imperial Parliament and so long as Her Majesty's Order-in-Council of the 7th December, 1855, shall remain unrevoked and in force." In the case of Natal the coasting trade was automatically opened under the operation of the Act of 1869, and on the line of reasoning which has been adopted in the case of the Commonwealth of Australia, it would seem that the coasting trade of the Cape Province and of the Natal Province could now be closed if desired to Austrian and Hungarian ships.

17. There arises, however, a further question. In the case of Canada, in 1868 when the Treaty was made, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia were independent Colonies and not parts of the Dominion. In the case of Australia there was no Commonwealth and the six States were six Colonies. In the case of South Africa there was no Union and the Cape of Good Hope and Natal were separate Colonies. Since that date Canada has been completed by the addition of British Columbia in 1871, and Prince Edward Island in 1873; the six States of Australia have been merged in the Commonwealth, and the Cape and Natal form part of the Union, and trade therefore between any port in Canada and another port, between any port in the Commonwealth and another port, and between any port in the Union and another port, has become a coasting trade in the contemplation of the Imperial Merchant Shipping Acts. It is clear that in 1868, under the unambiguous terms of paragraph 1 of Article 1 of the Anglo-Austro-Hungarian Treaty as applied to Her Majesty's Colonies and foreign possessions by paragraph 1 of Article 2, the trade between Canada and British Columbia or Prince Edward Island, between the different Colonies in Australia, and between the Cape and Natal, was not a coasting trade and was open to Austrian and Hungarian ships under the Treaty on the terms laid down in Article 1. The question therefore arises whether the completion of the Confederation of Canada, and the Federation of the Commonwealth, and the Union of South Africa have altered the position and confer upon the Governments and Parliaments of these Dominions the right to exclude Austrian and Hungarian ships from the coasting trade in the sense of the carriage of passengers or goods from one Province or State to another Province or State.

18. In this connexion I am desired by Sir E. Grey to draw your attention to the opinions given by your predecessors on the 11th March, 1902, and the 2nd December, 1907 (copies of which are appended), which deal with the question whether Confederation determined the application of a Treaty to a part of the Commonwealth in which it had previously been in force. It would appear that these opinions were based on the view that the application of the Treaty with Japan, which is discussed in both opinions, was not conditioned by the existence of Queensland as a separate Colony, whereas it would appear to be necessary to read some such condition into the Austro-Hungarian Treaty if it is to be held that what was intercolonial trade in 1868 must remain on the same footing during the currency of the Treaty.

19. I am also to point out that the Treaty is regarded as applicable to British Possessions acquired since 1868, and that it would therefore be not inconsistent, since Austria-Hungary is given the benefit of any increase in the number of British Colonies, to ask the Austro-Hungarian Government to accept the effect of any reduction in that number which is due to bonâ fide reorganisation. If what was a Colony in 1868 must remain a Colony for the purposes of the Treaty, it would appear that there is no alternative to holding that the terms of the Treaty have no application to territories such as Papua and the Cook Islands, which were not Colonies at that time.

20. I am further to observe that in the case of Canada, as will be seen from the facts set out above, the Canadian Government have assumed that they have the right to exclude Austrian and Hungarian ships from the coasting trade between the eastern provinces and British Columbia, and between the four provinces forming Canada, as it existed in 1868, and Prince Edward Island, and that the Austro-Hungarian Government have not protested against this action. It is, however, the case that the instance of Canada differs from the other two cases, inasmuch as the Constitution of the Dominion, which contemplated the admission of both British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, was an existing fact in 1868, and one which the Austro-Hungarian Government may have been taken to have had under contemplation when the Treaty was entered into.

21. The points raised above would also apply to any case in which, as in the case of the annexation of the Cook Islands to New Zealand, new territory has been added since 1868 to an existing British Possession.

22. The definition of coasting trade, as it is dealt with by Part 6 of the Navigation Bill of the Commonwealth, will be found in clause 7. It will be observed that it covers both inter-State and intra-State trade. Except for the special privileges conferred on British ships by clauses 286 and 287, foreign ships are admitted by the Bill to the coasting trade on the same terms as British ships, but the question of the power of the Commonwealth to exclude foreign vessels was raised in the Commonwealth Parliament during the discussion of the Bill, and the matter may become of practical importance at any time.

23. I am to request, therefore, that you will take this matter into your consideration, and that you will report to Sir E. Grey—

(1.) Whether, in your opinion, it is competent for a Colonial Legislature, during the currency of the Treaty of 1868, to exclude Austrian and Hungarian ships from a coasting trade to which they have once been admitted;

(2.) Whether any distinction can in this respect be drawn between cases in which the coasting trade of a Colony had already been opened when the Treaty was concluded, and cases in which it was opened subsequently; and

(3.) Whether what was merely trade between Colony and Colony when the Treaty was concluded in 1868, can be treated as coasting trade if the Colonies have been merged into a larger unit by process of bonâ fide reorganisation.

24. Sir E. Grey would also be glad to receive any observations of a general nature which you may desire to offer upon the papers now submitted to you.

(2.) No.

(3.) Yes. The reason for treating trade between two neighbouring Colonies as inter-colonial as opposed to coasting is merely that they are under distinct internal Administrations, though both part of His Majesty's Dominions. If they become one administrative unit the only reason for regarding the trade between them as anything but coasting trade disappears.

[April 30, 1913.]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 29, 1913.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit to you herewith the draft of an Order in Council to be entitled "The Bahrein Order in Council, 1913."

In explanation of the terms of the draft, I am to state that on the 26th January, 1909, the Sub-Committee of the Committee of Imperial Defence appointed by the Prime Minister to consider questions relating to the Persian Gulf and Bagdad Railway, issued a report containing the following passage:—

"It would strengthen our position in Bahrein and remove risks of interference by foreign Powers, other than Turkey or Persia, if the jurisdiction over foreigners in the

Bahrein
Order in Council,
1913.

island were placed in our hands. The Government of India should be instructed to approach the Sheikh with the object of inducing him to prefer a request to be relieved from the responsibility of exercising jurisdiction over foreigners. If this can be arranged, an Order in Council should be drawn up, the preamble of which should recite the circumstances in which the transfer of jurisdiction has been effected."

This recommendation was made in accordance with proposals put forward in November 1907 by the Government of India, to whom, on the 21st May, 1909, a despatch,* copy of which is enclosed, was accordingly addressed by His Majesty's then Secretary of State for India, conveying the necessary instructions as to approaching the Sheikh of Bahrein with a view to induce him to request His Majesty's Government to relieve him of the responsibility of exercising jurisdiction over foreigners in his possessions.

The Sheikh was approached and in due course preferred the desired request to give effect to which the Order has now been drafted.

I am to request that you will take the draft Order into your consideration and that you will favour Sir E. Grey at your earliest convenience with your opinion whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

I have, &c.

LOUIS MALLET.

Report.

In our opinion this draft Order, as altered and initialled by us, may properly be submitted to the King for the approval of His Majesty in Council.

(b.) So much of the 6th section of the said Act as requires the expiration of fifteen days before issue of warrant shall be excepted.

Where under any such Imperial Act, Law, or Order, any publication is required to be made, as respects any judicial proceeding in any "Gazette" or otherwise, such publication shall be made by such mode as the Court shall think fit to direct.

PART III.—Criminal.

14.—(1.) Subject to the other provisions of this Order, the Code of Criminal Procedure and the other enactments relating to the administration of criminal justice in British India for the time being shall be applicable to Bahrein. The Political Resident in the Persian Gulf shall hold and form a Court, to be called the Chief Court, which shall have all the powers of a High Court of Judicature; the Political Agent at Bahrein shall be deemed to be the District Magistrate and Sessions Judge; the Judicial Assistant to the Political Resident shall be deemed to be the Additional District Magistrate and Additional Sessions Judge; and the powers of the Governor-General in Council and of the Local Government under those enactments shall be exercisable by the Secretary of State, or, with his previous or subsequent assent, by the Governor-General of India in Council.

Notwithstanding, in any case triable by a Subordinate Magistrate under Chapters XVI to XXIII inclusive of the Indian Penal Code, if both the complainant and defendant are Mahomedans and are acquiescent in such procedure, the Political Agent may order the case to be tried by a Kazi, a representative from the Agency attending to record briefly the proceedings. In such suits the judgment passed by the Kazi cannot be carried into effect until it is ratified by the Political Agent, and the Political Agent is empowered to revise the finding and sentence as if the Kazi were a Subordinate Magistrate, or to return the case for re-trial to the same or another Kazi. The sentence of the Kazi, when ratified by the Political Agent, shall for all purposes be regarded as if it were the decision of the Political Agent in the District Court.

(2.) Any jurisdiction exercisable by the Chief Court in criminal matters under this Order may be exercised by the Judge of that Court either within the limits of this Order or elsewhere.

15. In cases in which the Code of Criminal Procedure requires the sentence of a Court of Session to be confirmed by the High Court, the sentence shall be referred for confirmation to the Governor-General of India in Council instead of to the Chief Court.

16. Where a person subject to this Order is accused of the commission of an offence the cognizance whereof appertains to the Court, and it is expedient that the offence be inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in a British possession, the accused may (under "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," section 6) be sent for trial to Bombay.

The Chief Court may, where it appears so expedient, by warrant under the hand and seal of the Political Resident, cause the accused to be sent for trial to Bombay accordingly.

The warrant shall be sufficient authority to any person to whom it is directed to receive and detain the person therein named, and to carry him to and deliver him up at Bombay according to the warrant.

Where any person is to be so sent to Bombay, the Court before which he is charged shall take the preliminary examination, and shall bind over such of the proper witnesses as are British subjects in their own recognizances to appear and give evidence on the trial.

17.—(1.) The Political Resident may by General Order prescribe the manner in which, and the places at which, sentences of imprisonment are to be carried into execution within the limits of the Order.

(2.) The Court may, in any case by warrant sealed with its seal, cause an offender convicted and sentenced to imprisonment before the Court to be removed to, and imprisoned in, any place that shall be prescribed by the Political Resident under the authority provided for in subsection (1) of this Article.

18. Where an offender convicted before any Court under this Order is sentenced to imprisonment, and the Political Resident proceeding under section 7 of "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," authority in that behalf being hereby given to him, considers it expedient that the sentence should be carried into effect elsewhere than within the limits of this Order, and the offender is accordingly sent for imprisonment to a place outside the limits of this Order, the place shall be either a place in the Presidency of Bombay, or a place in some other part of His Majesty's dominions, the Government whereof consents that offenders may be sent thither under this Article, or a place in which by Treaty, grant, usage, sufferance or other lawful means His Majesty has jurisdiction, provided that if a person is not a British subject he shall only be sent under this Article to a place in His Majesty's dominions.

19.—(1.) In cases of murder or culpable homicide, if either the death or the criminal act which wholly or partly caused the death happened in Bahrein, a Court acting under this Order shall have the like jurisdiction over any person to whom this Order applies who is charged either as a principal offender or as an abettor as if both such criminal act and the death had happened in Bahrein.

(2.) In the case of any offence committed on the high seas or within the Admiralty jurisdiction by any person who at the time of committing such offence was on board a British ship, or by any British subject on board a foreign ship to which he did not belong, the Court shall, subject to the provisions of this Order, have jurisdiction over such person as if the offence had been committed within its jurisdiction.

(3.) In cases tried under this Article no different sentence can be passed from the sentence which could be passed in England if the crime were tried there.

(4.) The foregoing provisions of this Article shall be deemed to be adaptations, for the purposes of this Order and of "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," of the following enactments, namely:—

- "The Admiralty Offences (Colonial) Act, 1849";
- "The Admiralty Offences (Colonial) Act, 1860";
- "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," Part XIII; and those enactments shall apply accordingly, and be administered in Bahrein.

20. Where a person is convicted of an offence, the Court before which he is convicted may, if it thinks fit at any time before he is discharged, require him to give security to the satisfaction of the Court for his future good behaviour, and for that purpose may, if it thinks fit, cause him to come or be brought before the Court.

21.—(1.) Where it is shown by evidence on oath, to the satisfaction of the District Court, that any British subject has committed, or is about to commit, an offence against this Order, or is otherwise conducting himself so as to be dangerous to peace and good order, or is endeavouring to excite enmity between the people of Bahrein and His Majesty, or is intriguing within the limits of this Order against His Majesty's power and authority, the Court may, if it thinks fit, by order under its seal, prohibit that person from being within the limits of this Order, during any time therein specified, not exceeding two years.

(2.) The Court, by order in writing under its seal, may vary any order of prohibition (not extending the duration thereof), and may revoke any order of prohibition or removal.

(3.) The Court shall forthwith report the order and the grounds thereof to the Chief Court, which shall forthwith report to the Governor-General of India in Council every order made under this Article, and the grounds thereof, and the proceedings thereunder.

22.—(1.) If any British subject fails to give security for good behaviour or for keeping the peace when lawfully required to do so, or fails to comply with an order of prohibition made under this Order, the Chief Court or the District Court may, if it thinks fit, order that he be deported from any place within its jurisdiction as prescribed by this Order.

(2.) If the order of deportation is made by the District Court, it shall forthwith report to the Chief Court the order and the grounds thereof.

(3.) Thereupon the person ordered to be deported shall, unless the Chief Court thinks fit otherwise to direct, be as soon as practicable, and in the case of a person convicted either under execution of the sentence or while it is in course of execution, removed in custody under warrant to the place named in the warrant.

(4.) The place shall be a place in that part of His Majesty's dominions, or in the British Protectorate, to which the person belongs, or the Government of which consents to the reception of persons deported under this Order.

(5.) The Court, on making an order of deportation, may, if it thinks fit, order the person to be deported to pay all or any part of the expenses of his deportation, to be fixed by the Court in the order. Subject thereto, the expenses of deportation shall be defrayed as the Secretary of State, with the concurrence of the Treasury, or with the previous or subsequent assent of the Secretary of State, the Governor-General of India in Council, directs.

(6.) The Chief Court shall forthwith report to the Governor-General of India in Council every order of deportation made under this Order, and the grounds thereof, and the proceedings thereunder.

(7.) If a person deported under this Order returns to Bahrein without permission in writing of the Chief Court, or the Governor-General of India in Council, or the Secretary of State (which permission the Chief Court, or the Governor-General of India in Council, or the Secretary of State respectively may give, he shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two months, or with a fine which may extend to 1,000 rupees, or with both.

(8.) He shall also be liable to be forthwith again deported under the original or a new order, and a fresh warrant.

23. An appeal shall not lie against an order of prohibition, or removal, or deportation made under this Order.

24.—(1.) Where under this Order a person is to be sent or removed or deported from any place within the jurisdiction of the Court as prescribed by this Order he shall, by warrant of the Court sealed with its seal, be detained, if necessary, in custody, or in prison, until a fit opportunity for his removal or deportation occurs, and then be put on board a vessel belonging to, or in the service of, His Majesty, or if no such vessel is available, then on board some other British or other fit vessel.

(2.) The warrant shall be sufficient authority to the person to whom it is directed or delivered for execution, and to the Commanding Officer or master of the vessel, to receive and detain the person therein named, in the manner therein prescribed, and to send or remove and carry him to the place therein named, according to the warrant.

(3.) In case of sending or removal for any purpose other than deportation, the warrant shall be issued in duplicate, and the person executing it shall, as soon as practicable after his arrival at the place therein named, deliver, according to the warrant, with one of the duplicates of the warrant, to a constable, or proper officer of police, or keeper of a prison, or other proper authority or person there, the person named in the warrant, to be produced on the order of the proper Court or authority there, or to be otherwise dealt with according to law.

A Minute shall be made and kept of every such case of punishment, recording the facts of the offence and the extent of the punishment.

Provided that, if the Court thinks fit, instead of proceeding under the preceding provisions, it may direct or cause the offender to be tried in a separate criminal prosecution or proceeding, in which the offender shall be liable to any punishment to which he would be liable if the offence were committed in relation to the Court of a Sessions Judge in India.

Nothing herein shall interfere with the power of the Court to remove or exclude persons who interrupt or obstruct the proceedings of the Court.

(2.) Any jurisdiction exercisable by the Chief Court under this Order in civil matters may be exercised by the Judge of that Court, either within the limits of this Order or elsewhere.

36. When a suit between persons to whom this Order applies is filed in the Political Agency, the Political Agent shall enquire from the several parties whether they desire that proceedings shall be instituted in accordance with the Code of Civil Procedure and the Indian enactments made applicable to Bahrein, or in accordance with local usage, and shall record their replies.

37. When any of the several parties desire that the suit shall be determined in accordance with the Code of Civil Procedure and other enactments made applicable to Bahrein, the District Court shall forthwith proceed to decide the suit in accordance with the provisions of such enactments, as far as local conditions permit.

Nothing in this section shall prevent the District Court from referring—

(a.) A question of local custom to the Majlis-el-Urf, for consideration and report;

(b.) A dispute over accounts between pearling-masters and divers to the Salifah Court for scrutiny and adjustment;

nor shall prevent the District Court, the Majlis-el-Urf, or the Salifah Court from referring any matter in the progress of a suit which involves a point of Mahomedan Law to a Kazi for decision, or from sending any party or witness, being a Mahomedan, to a Kazi for the administration of an oath.

38.—(1.) The Foreign Jurisdiction (Admiralty) Order in Council, 1910, shall apply to Bahrein, and the Chief Court shall have the jurisdiction conferred by Article 4 of that Order, and the District Court shall be deemed to be a Provincial Court, and the Registry thereof a District Registry within the meaning of the said Order.

(2.) Admiralty actions commenced in the said Registry shall be tried in the District Court, unless the Chief Court is at the time sitting within the limits of this Order, or unless all parties agree that the action shall be tried in the Chief Court sitting elsewhere than within the limits of this Order.

(3.) The duties of the Registrar and of the Marshal either of the Chief Court or of the District Court under the said Order shall be performed by such officers as the Political Resident shall direct.

39.—(1.) The District Court shall endeavour to obtain, as early as may be, notice of the deaths of all British subjects or foreigners leaving property in any place within the jurisdiction of the Court as prescribed by this Order, and all such information as may serve to guide the Court with respect to the securing and administration of their property.

(2.) On receiving notice of the death of such a person, the Court shall put up a notice thereof at the Court-house, and shall keep the same there until probate or administration is granted, or, where it appears to the Court that probate or administration will not be applied for, or cannot be granted, for such time as it thinks fit.

(3.) The Court shall, where the circumstances of the case appear so to require, as soon as may be, take possession of the property left by the deceased in any place within the jurisdiction of the Court as prescribed by this Order, or put it under its seal (in either case, if the nature of the property or other circumstances so require, making an inventory), and so keep it until it can be dealt with according to law; perishable articles being disposed of as the Court may consider best in the interests of the estate.

(4.) All expenses incurred on behalf of the Court in so doing shall be the first charge on the property of the deceased, and the Court shall, by sale of part of that property, or otherwise, provide for the discharge of these expenses.

(5.) When a British subject or foreigner dies within the jurisdiction of the Court as prescribed by this Order intestate, his property, or so much thereof as is within those limits, shall, until administration is granted, vest in the Political Agent.

40. If a person to whom this Order applies be named executor in a will, and to the establishment of whose title as such it is necessary to obtain probate of that will, take possession of and administers, or otherwise deals with, any part of the property of the deceased, and does not obtain probate within one month after the death or after the termination of any proceeding respecting probate or administration, he shall be liable to pay double the amount of any fees chargeable on obtaining probate, and he shall also be liable to a fine which may extend to 1,000 rupees.

41. If any person, to whom this Order applies, other than the person named executor, or the administrator, or a person entitled to represent the deceased without obtaining probate or letters of administration, or an officer of the Court, takes possession of and administers, or otherwise deals with, any part of the property of the deceased, he shall, as soon as practicable, notify the fact and the circumstances to the District Court, and shall furnish to the Court all such information as the Court requires, and shall conform to any direction of the Court in relation to the custody, disposal, or transmission of the property or the proceeds thereof, and, in case of any contravention of this Article, he shall be punished with fine, which may extend to 1,000 rupees.

42.—(1.) When the peculiar circumstances of the case appear to the District Court so to require; for reasons recorded in its proceedings, the Court may, if it thinks fit, of its own motion or otherwise, grant letters of administration to an officer of the Court.

(2.) The officer so appointed shall act under the direction of the Court, and shall be indemnified thereby.

(3.) He shall publish such notices, if any, as the Court thinks fit, in Bahrein, the Persian Coast and Islands, Bombay, the United Kingdom, and elsewhere.

(4.) The Court shall require and compel him to file, in the proper office of the Court, his accounts of his administration at intervals not exceeding three months, and shall forthwith examine them and report thereon to the Chief Court.

(5.) The accounts shall be audited under the direction of the District Court.

(6.) All expenses incurred on behalf of the Court in execution of this Article shall be the first charge on the estate of the deceased as dealt with in accordance with the provisions of this Order; and the Court shall, by the sale of that estate or otherwise, provide for the discharge of those expenses.

43. In cases where parties are Mahomedans the District Court may refer any question, concerning probate of wills or administration of property of deceased persons to whom this Order applied, to a Kazi for settlement under the general supervision of the Court.

PART V.—Bahrein Subjects and Tribunals.

(a.) Criminal.

44.—(1.) When a Bahrein subject desires to institute a complaint against a person to whom this Order applies, or a person to whom this Order applies desires to institute a complaint against a Bahrein subject, the Political Agent shall entertain the same, and may—

(a.) With the concurrence of the Sheikh of Bahrein, himself hear and determine it in his District Court; or

(b.) Send it to the Joint Court; or

(c.) If the defendant is a Mahomedan, refer it to a Kazi for decision, sending a representative of the Agency to record briefly the proceedings. Such decision, when endorsed by the Political Agent, shall for all purposes be considered as if it were that of the District Court.

(2.) Nothing in this Article shall prevent the Political Resident from exercising the revisory powers possessed by him under Article 4 of the Convention with Bahrein, dated the 31st May, 1861.

(b.) Civil.

45.—(1.) When a Bahrein subject desires to bring a suit against a person to whom this Order applies, or a person to whom this Order applies desires to bring a suit against a Bahrein subject, the Political Agent shall admit the complaint, and

(a.) With the concurrence of the Sheikh of Bahrein, may hear and determine the suit in his District Court; or

(b.) May hear and determine it in a Joint Court; or

(c.) May refer it to the Majlis-el-Urf for decision; or

(d.) In cases between pearling-masters and divers, may refer it to the Salifah Court; or (e.) With the consent of the several parties, may refer the case to one or more Arbitrators for settlement.

(2.) The judgment of the Joint Court or of the Majlis-el-Urf shall for all purposes be considered the same as if it were that of the District Court.

(3.) An appeal from the decision of the Salifah Court shall lie to the Political Agent acting in concert with the Sheikh of Bahrein, and in all Salifah cases their joint decision shall be final.

(4.) The award of the Arbitrator under sub-Article 1 (e) shall be final, and shall not be open to appeal unless the same shall, within a reasonable time, have been ordered by the Political Agent to be set aside on the ground that it is not final or is defective, or that the Arbitrator has exceeded his authority or has been guilty of misconduct in the matter.

(5.) Nothing herein mentioned shall prevent the District Court, the Joint Court, the Majlis-el-Urf, the Salifah Court, or the Arbitrator from referring any matter in the progress of a suit which involves a point of Mahomedan law to a Kazi for decision, or from sending any party or witnesses, being a Mahomedan, to a Kazi for the administration of an oath.

46.—(1.) Where a Bahrein subject obtains, in a Court established under this Order, a decree or order against a defendant being a British subject, or foreigner, and in another suit that defendant is plaintiff and the Bahrein subject is defendant, the Court may, if it thinks fit, on the application of the British subject, or foreigner, stay the enforcement of the decree or order pending that other suit, and may set off any amount decreed or ordered to be paid by one party in one suit against any amount decreed or ordered to be paid by the other party in the other suit.

(2.) Where a plaintiff, being a Bahrein subject, obtains a decree or order, in a Court established under this Order, against two or more defendants, being British subjects, or foreigners, jointly, and in another suit one of them is a plaintiff and the Bahrein subject is defendant, the Court may, if it thinks fit, on the application of the British subjects, or foreigners, stay the enforcement of the decree or order pending that other suit, and may set off any amount decreed or ordered to be paid by one party in one suit against any amount decreed or ordered to be paid by the other party in the other suit, without prejudice to the right of the British subject or foreigner to obtain contribution from his co-defendants under the joint liability.

(3.) Where in a suit a Bahrein subject is co-plaintiff with a British subject or foreigner who is in Bahrein, it shall not be necessary for the Bahrein subject to give security under this Article as regards fees and costs, unless the Court so directs; but the co-plaintiff British subject, or foreigner, shall be responsible for all fees and costs.

47.—(1.) Every agreement for reference to arbitration between a person to whom this Order applies on the one hand, and a Bahrein subject on the other hand, may, on the application of any party, be filed for execution in the office of the Court.

(2.) The Court shall thereupon have authority to enforce the agreement, and the award made thereunder, and to control and regulate the proceedings before and after the award, in such manner and on such terms as the Court may think fit, in concert with the Sheikh or his representative.

(c.) General.

48.—(1.) Where it is proved that the attendance of a person to whom this Order applies, to give evidence, or for any other purpose connected with the administration of justice, is required before a Bahrein Tribunal, a Court established under this Order may, if it thinks fit, in a case and in circumstances in which the Court would require the attendance of that person before the Court, order that he do attend as required.

(2.) If the person ordered to attend, having reasonable notice of the time and place at which he is required to attend, fails to attend accordingly and does not excuse his failure to the satisfaction of the Court, he shall, independently of any other liability, be liable to be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two months, or with fine which may extend to 1,000 rupees, or with both.

49. When a person to whom this Order applies invokes or submits to the jurisdiction of a Bahrain Tribunal, and engages in writing to abide by the decision of that Tribunal or to pay any fees or expenses ordered by that Tribunal to be paid by him, the Court may, on such evidence as it thinks fit to require, enforce payment of such fees and expenses in the same manner as if they were fees payable in a proceeding in the Court, and shall pay over and account for the same, when levied, to the proper Bahrain authority, as the Court may direct.

50.—(1.) If a person to whom this Order applies wilfully gives false evidence in a proceeding before a Bahrain Tribunal, or in an arbitration between a person to whom this Order applies, on the one hand, and a Bahrain subject, on the other hand, he shall be guilty of an offence, and shall, on conviction, be liable to be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two months, or with a fine which may extend to 1,000 rupees, or with both.

(2.) Nothing in this Article shall exempt a person from liability under any other British or British Indian law to any other or higher punishment or penalty:

Provided that no person shall be punished twice for the same offence.

PART VI.—Registration.

51. A register of persons to whom this Order applies shall be kept in the Political Agency.

52. Every person to whom this Order applies, being of the age of 21 years or upwards, or being married, or a widower, or a widow, though under that age, shall register himself at the Political Agency within three months of the commencement of this Order, if resident within the limits of this Order at that time, or, if arriving within the limits of this Order, within one month after such arrival:

Provided that a person who fails to register himself within the time limited by this Article may be registered at any time if he excuses his failure to the satisfaction of the Political Agent.

53. The registration of a man shall comprise the registration of his wife, or wives, if living with him; and the registration of the head of a family shall comprise the registration of all females and minors, being his relatives in whatever degree, living under the same roof with him at the time of his registration.

54. Registration under this Order shall be renewed annually in the month of January.

55. Every person who has not previously been registered applying to be registered under this Order shall, unless excused by the Political Agent, attend personally for that purpose at the Political Agency; but no person applying for the renewal of his registration need attend personally unless directed by the Political Agent so to do.

56. Every person registering himself under this Order may obtain, if he so desire, a certificate of registration in such form as may be prescribed by the Political Resident.

57. If any person to whom this Order applies neglects to register himself under its provisions he shall not be entitled to the protection, assistance, or good offices of the Political Agent, and shall be liable to a fine not exceeding 20 rupees for each instance of such failure, but he shall, although not registered, be subject to the jurisdiction of the Courts established by this Order.

58. A person applying to be registered under this Order must produce such evidence as the Political Agent may think necessary that he is entitled to be registered.

59. Registration under this Order shall be no evidence of nationality, and a statement to that effect shall be inserted on the face of every certificate of registration issued under this Order.

PART VII.—Miscellaneous Provisions.

60. Subject to the control of the Secretary of State the Political Resident may, from time to time, with the previous sanction of the Governor-General of India in Council, make rules of procedure and other rules, consistent with this Order, for the better execution of the provisions herein contained in respect of any matter arising in the course of any civil or criminal case, including insolvency and bankruptcy proceedings.

61.—(1.) Subject to the control of the Secretary of State acting with the concurrence of the Treasury, the Political Resident may, from time to time, with the previous sanction of the Governor-General of India in Council, make rules imposing fees leviable in respect of any proceedings in, or processes issued out of, any Court established under this Order.

(2.) But a Court before which any matter is pending may, in any case, if it thinks fit, on account of the poverty of a party, or for any other reason, dispense in whole or in part with the payment of any fees chargeable in respect of such matter.

62.—(1.) All fees, charges, expenses, costs, fines, damages, and other money payable under this Order, or under any law made applicable by this Order, may be enforced under order of the Court by seizure and sale of goods, and, in default of sufficient goods, by imprisonment as a civil prisoner for a term not exceeding one month, but such imprisonment shall not operate as a satisfaction or extinguishment of the liability.

(2.) Any bill of sale or mortgage, or transfer of property, made with the view of avoiding such seizure or sale, shall not be effectual to defeat the provisions of this Order.

(3.) All fees, penalties, fines, and forfeitures levied under this Order upon a British subject, and fees, other than actual Court fees, that may be levied under the provisions of this Order, on a person to whom this Order applies, shall be paid to the public account, and shall be applied in such manner as the Secretary of State, with the consent of the Treasury, or, with the previous or subsequent assent of the Secretary of State, as the Governor-General of India in Council may direct.

63. Whenever an Acting Political Agent or Acting Judicial Assistant has commenced the hearing of any cause or matter, civil or criminal, he may, unless the Political Resident otherwise directs, continue and complete the hearing and determination thereof, notwithstanding that his authority to act as Political Agent or Judicial Assistant has otherwise ceased by reason of the expiration of the time for which he was appointed to act, or by reason of the happening of any event by which his authority is determined.

64.—(1.) If an officer of the Court, employed to execute a decree or order, loses, by neglect or omission, the opportunity of executing it, then, on complaint of the persons aggrieved, and proof of the fact alleged, the Court may, if it thinks fit, order the officer to pay the damages sustained by the person complaining, or part thereof.

(2.) The order may be enforced as an order directing payment of money.

65.—(1.) If a clerk or officer of the Court, acting under pretence of the process or authority of the Court, is charged with extortion, or with not paying over money duly levied, or with other misconduct, the Court may, if it thinks fit, enquire into the charge in a summary way, and may for that purpose summon and enforce the attendance of all necessary persons as in a suit, and may make such order for the repayment of any money extorted, or for the payment over of any money levied, and for the payment of any such damages and costs as the Court thinks fit.

(2.) The Court may also, if it thinks fit, on the same enquiry, impose on the clerk or officer such fine, not exceeding 50 rupees for each offence, as the Court thinks fit.

(3.) A clerk or officer punished under this Article shall not, without the leave of the Court, be liable to a civil suit in respect of the same matter; and any such suit, if already or afterwards begun, may be stayed by the Court in such manner and on such terms as the Court thinks fit.

(4.) Nothing in this Article shall be deemed to prevent any person from being prosecuted under any other British or British Indian law for any act or omission punishable under this Article, or from being liable under that other law to any other or higher punishment or penalty than that provided by this Article:

Provided that no person shall be punished twice for the same offence.

66. The Political Resident or the Political Agent may exercise any power conferred on any Justices of the Peace within His Majesty's dominions by any Act of Parliament, for the time being in force, regulating merchant seamen or the mercantile marine.

67. Where under "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," anything is authorised to be done by, to, or before a Consular officer, such thing may be done in any place in Bahrain by, to, or before the Political Resident, or the Political Agent.

68. The Political Resident and the Political Agent shall each be entitled in Bahrain to act as a Notary Public.

69. The Court shall have jurisdiction from time to time to make an order requiring a person to whom this Order applies to contribute in such manner as the Court directs, to the support of his wife, or to the support of his or her child, whether legitimate or not, being, in the opinion of the Court, under the age of 16 years. Any such order may be made in a summary way, as if the neglect to provide for the support of such wife or child were an offence, and any failure to comply with any such order shall be deemed to be an offence, and shall be punishable with a fine not exceeding 10 rupees for any one default, and the Court may direct any penalty imposed for such offence to be applied for the support of such wife or child in such manner as the Court thinks fit.

70. The Political Resident shall have power to make Regulations (to be called "King's Regulations") for the following purposes (that is to say):—

(a.) For the peace, order, and good government of persons to whom this Order applies in relation to matters not provided for by this Order.

(b.) For securing the observance of any Treaty for the time being in force relating to any place within the limits of this Order, or of any native or local law or custom, whether relating to trade, commerce, revenue, or any other matter.

(c.) For applying, amending, modifying, or repealing, with respect to Bahrain, any Acts or enactments which apply, or are made applicable, or have been brought into operation in Bahrain by or under any of the provisions of Article 11 of this Order.

(d.) For regulating or preventing the importation or exportation in British ships, or by any person to whom this Order applies, of arms or munitions of war, or any parts or ingredients thereof, and for giving effect to any Treaty relating to the importation or exportation of the same.

(e.) For requiring returns to be made of the nature, quantity, and value of articles exported from or imported into Bahrain by or on account of any person to whom this Order applies, or in any British ship, and for prescribing the times and manner at or in which, and the persons by whom, such Returns are to be made.

(f.) For the governance, visitation, care, and superintendence of prisons.

71.—1. Any Regulations made under the preceding Article may provide for forfeiture of any goods, receptacles, or things in relation to which, or to the contents of which, any breach is committed of such Regulations, or of any Treaty or any native or local law or custom, the observance of which is provided for by such Regulations.

(2.) Any person to whom this Order applies committing a breach of any such Regulations shall, in addition to any forfeiture prescribed thereby, be liable, on conviction, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding three months, or to a fine, or to both.

(3.) Any fine imposed for a breach of Regulation shall not exceed 1,500 rupees: provided that in the case of any breach of any native or local law relating to customs law, or under which the importation or exportation of any goods is prohibited or restricted, the fine may extend to a sum equivalent to treble the value of the goods in relation to which the breach is committed.

72.—(1.) King's Regulations shall not take effect until they are allowed by a Secretary of State, or, with his previous or subsequent assent, by the Governor-General of India in Council: provided that in case of urgency declared in any such Regulations, the same shall take effect before such allowance, and shall continue to have effect unless and until they are disallowed by the Secretary of State, or, with his previous or subsequent assent, by the Governor-General of India in Council, and until notification of such disallowance is received and published by the Political Resident, and such disallowance shall be without prejudice to anything done or suffered under such Regulations in the meantime.

(2.) All King's Regulations shall be published by the Political Resident in such manner and at such places as he may think proper.

(3.) In this Order "breach of the Regulations" includes the breach of any native or local law or custom, the observance of which is required by any King's Regulations.

73. Judicial notice shall be taken of this Order and of the commencement thereof, and of the appointment of the Political Resident, Political Agent, and Judicial Assistant, and of the constitution and limits of the Courts and districts, and of the seals and signatures, and of any Rules and Regulations made or in force under this Order, and no proof shall be required of any such matters.

74. Nothing in this Order shall deprive the Political Resident, or an officer subordinate to him, of the right to observe, and to enforce the observance of, or shall deprive any person of the benefit of any reasonable custom existing in Bahrein, unless this Order contains some express and specific provision incompatible with the observance thereof.

75. Nothing in this Order shall—

(i.) Affect any power or jurisdiction conferred by, or referred to in, the Act of the Governor-General of India in Council, entitled "The Foreign Jurisdiction and Extradition Act, 1879" (Act XXI of 1879), or in "The Indian (Foreign Jurisdiction) Order in Council, 1902"; or

(ii.) Affect any jurisdiction for the time being exercisable by the Political Resident under any Imperial Act other than "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890"; or

(iii.) Prevent the Political Agent from doing anything which His Majesty's Consuls in the dominions of any State in amity with His Majesty are for the time being, by law, usage, or sufferance, entitled or enabled to do.

76. If a question arises whether any place is or is not in Bahrein for the purposes of this Order, it shall be referred to the Political Resident, and a certificate under his hand and seal shall be conclusive on the question, and shall be taken judicial notice of by any Court established under this Order.

77. Not later than the 31st day of March in each year, or such other day as the Secretary of State, or, with his previous or subsequent assent, as the Governor-General of India in Council, directs from time to time, the Political Resident shall send to the Governor-General of India in Council, for transmission to the Secretary of State, a Report on the operation of this Order up to the 31st day of December in the previous year, or such other date as the Secretary of State, or, with his previous or subsequent assent, as the Governor-General of India in Council directs from time to time, showing for the last twelve months the number and nature of the proceedings, criminal and civil, taken under this Order, and the result thereof, and the number and amount of fees received, and such other information, and being in such form as the Secretary of State, or, with his previous or subsequent assent, as the Governor-General of India in Council from time to time directs.

78.—(1.) A printed copy of this Order, and of all Rules of Procedure and other Rules for the time being in force under this Order, shall be kept open to inspection free of charge in the office of the Political Agent and of each Court established under this Order.

(2.) Printed copies thereof shall be sold within the islands of Bahrein at such reasonable price as the Political Agent from time to time directs.

79.—(1.) This Order shall be published in the "Gazette of India" within such time after the passing thereof as the Secretary of State may prescribe, and shall come into force on such day (in this Order referred to as the commencement of this Order), within six months after that publication, as the Governor-General of India in Council may, by notification in the said "Gazette," appoint in this behalf.

(2.) But any appointment under this Order may be made at any time after its passing, and no proof shall, in any proceedings, be required of any of the matters prescribed by this Article.

And the Most Honourable the Marquess of Crewe K.G., and the Right Honourable Sir Edward Grey, Bart., K.G., two of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, are to give the necessary directions herein as to them may respectively appertain.

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, November 28, 1912.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you herewith the draft of an Order in Council (Paper (A)) to be entitled "The China (Amendment) Order in Council, 1912."

In explanation of the terms of the draft, I am to point out that clause 3 provides a penalty to be imposed for the breach of approved international regulations under article 74 of the China Order in Council of 1904 (Paper (B)) in cases where no such penalty is laid down in the Regulations themselves, as some inconvenience has been experienced in the past owing to the absence of any such provision.

Clause 4 is intended to meet cases of false swearing in foreign Courts, which act has been held by His Majesty's Assistant Judge in a recent case, Rex v. Shekury (Paper (E)), not to be a criminal offence against English law.

Clause 5 enables the Court to punish British subjects who may be guilty of contempt of Court or similar offences in the course of proceedings before a foreign Court in China. At present such offenders cannot be dealt with in any Court.

Clauses 6-17 are an adaptation of "The Criminal Appeal Act, 1907," with certain alterations suggested by the Judge of the Supreme Court at Shanghai (Paper (F)).

Clauses 18-42 embody the rules which the Privy Council have now adopted as the model which they wish to be followed in regulating appeals to the Judicial Committee of that body.

Clauses 43-50 introduce for China the system of keeping a register of British companies at the consulates as well as the register of British subjects. They are taken from "The Ottoman Order in Council, 1910," articles 163-170 (Paper (G)), with certain amendments based upon recommendations made by His Majesty's consular officers in China (Paper (H)).

Clause 51 has been drawn up in view of Sir J. Jordan's representations as to the inadequate means which now exist for bringing suits against public institutions of an international (though not Chinese) character in their corporate capacity, such as the Cemetery and Hospital Boards and the Plague Committee, which are situated in the foreign concessions in Hankow and are under foreign administration (Papers (I) and (J)).

China (Amendment) Order
in Council,
1913.

A Court of Consuls, which takes cognisance of such suits, has existed at Shanghai since 1869. Particulars with regard to this Court will be found in a memorandum in Paper (I). There is a difficulty however with regard to this Court, in that there is some doubt as to whether it has any valid existence in law.

The Shanghai Land Regulations under which it was established were expressly sanctioned, in view of doubts which had been expressed as to their validity, by the China and Japan Order in Council of 1881, but this Order was repealed by article 169 of the China and Corea Order in Council of 1904, and Sir E. Grey is advised that it is probable, in spite of the terms of article 169 (2) of that Order, that the Court has now no legal basis. The Court, however, exists de facto, and is a useful institution, and Sir E. Grey considers that provision should be made for enforcing the orders of this Court and those of similar Courts which may be established at Hankow or elsewhere upon persons subject to British jurisdiction. As such Courts are international in character, no means exist of establishing them by Order in Council; and, further, as the public institutions over which they exercise jurisdiction are not incorporated under the laws of any of the Treaty Powers they are not, and cannot be treated as, units subject to any of their Courts. The only course therefore which appears to be open, in order to provide for the exercise of jurisdiction over such institutions by Courts of the nature of a Court of Consuls, is to treat such Courts as foreign bodies and enforce their orders on persons subject to British jurisdiction, provided that the Secretary of State, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, has approved the instrument under which the Court of Consuls exists.

I am to request that you will take the draft Order into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

I have, &c.

ANNEX.

Draft China Order in Council.

WHEREAS by treaty, grant, usage, sufferance, or other lawful means, His Majesty the King has jurisdiction within the dominions of the Emperor of China:

Now, therefore, His Majesty, by virtue and in exercise of the powers in this behalf by "The † NOTE.—Article 6 of the Order in Council as passed was prepared to meet a necessity which arose while the draft Order was under the consideration of the Law Officers, and was therefore not included in the draft as sent to them.

Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," or otherwise in His Majesty vested, is pleased, by and with the advice of His Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, as follows:—

1. This Order may be cited as "The China (Amendment) Order in Council, 1912," and shall be read as one with "The China Order in Council, 1904," hereinafter referred to as the "Principal Order," and this Order and the China Orders in Council, 1904 to 1910, may be cited together as "The China Orders in Council, 1904 to 1912."

2. In this Order, unless the context otherwise requires:—

"Judgment" includes decree, order, sentence or decision;

"Record" means the aggregate of papers relating to an Appeal to His Majesty in Council (including the pleadings, proceedings, evidence, and judgments) proper to be laid before His Majesty in Council on the hearing of the Appeal;

"Registrar" includes the officer having the custody of the Records in the Supreme Court.

3.—(1.) Any person committing a breach of any International Regulations approved by the Secretary of State under article 74 of the Principal Order shall, on conviction, be liable to the punishment, forfeiture, or fine therein prescribed, or, if no such punishment or fine is prescribed, he shall be liable, on conviction, to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a period not exceeding one month, or to a fine not exceeding 20*l*.

(2.) Where a fine is recovered for breach of such Regulations, and the Regulations contain no provisions as to the manner in which it shall be disposed of and applied, it shall be disposed of and applied in such manner as the Minister may direct.

4. In the application of "The Perjury Act, 1911," by the Court, in the exercise of its criminal jurisdiction on the principles of, and in conformity with, English law for the time being under article 35 (2) of the Principal Order, the words "judicial proceeding" in the said Act shall be deemed to include a proceeding before a Chinese Court or a Court in China of any State in amity with His Majesty.

5. If any person subject to the jurisdiction of the Court does any act in relation to proceedings in a Chinese Court, or before a Chinese judicial officer, or in a Court or before a judicial officer in China of any State in amity with His Majesty, which, if done in the course of, or in relation to, any proceedings in the Court, would have been punishable as an offence, such person shall be guilty of an offence, and shall be liable, on conviction, to such punishment as he would have been liable to if the offence had been committed in the course of, or in relation to, proceedings in the Court.

Appeals in Criminal Cases.

6. Any person who is convicted of an offence on a trial under article 45 of the Principal Order, or who is sentenced, on a conviction for an offence under article 48 of the Principal Order, to be imprisoned without the option of a fine, may appeal to the Full Court—

(i.) Against his conviction—

- (a.) On any ground of appeal which involves a question of law alone; or
- (b.) With the leave of the Full Court, or upon the certificate of the Court which tried him, that it is a fit case for appeal against his conviction on any ground of appeal which involves a question of fact alone, or a question of mixed law and fact; or
- (c.) With the leave of the Full Court on any other ground which appears to the Full Court to be a sufficient ground of appeal.

(ii.) With the leave of the Full Court, against the sentence passed on his conviction, unless the sentence is one fixed by law.

7. After the hearing and determination at a summary trial under article 48 of the Principal Order of any information or complaint, either party to such summary trial may, if dissatisfied with the said determination as being erroneous in point of law, appeal to the Full Court.

8.—(1.) When a person desires to appeal to the Full Court under articles 6 or 7 he shall give notice of his appeal, or of his application for leave to appeal, to the Court against whose judgment or sentence he desires to appeal, in such manner as may be prescribed, within seven days of the date of his conviction or of the determination of an information or complaint.

(2.) An appellant may, in such manner as may be prescribed, present his case and his argument in writing, and deliver the same to the Registrar of the Court before which the trial took place. The ~~prosecutor~~ respondent may in like manner present his case and argument in writing, and deliver the same to the Registrar of the said Court.

(3.) Such Court shall thereupon send, under the seal of the Court, to the Registrar of the Supreme Court the notice, the case, and the argument, if any, and a report by the Judge who presided at the trial, together with such other papers and in such manner as may be prescribed.

(4.) Where the trial took place before a Judge of the Supreme Court, sitting elsewhere than at Shanghai, the papers may be transmitted to the Registrar of the Supreme Court through the Provincial Court of the district.

9. Where notice is given under article 8, the Court before which the trial was had may, as it thinks fit, either postpone judgment on the conviction or respite execution of the judgment, and either commit the person convicted to prison, or take security for him to come up for judgment, or to deliver himself for execution of the judgment (as the case may require) at an appointed time and place.

10. An appellant shall not be entitled to be present at the hearing of an appeal except by leave of the Full Court, or of the Court before which he was convicted.

11. (1.) Appeals under articles 6 and 7 of this Order shall be heard and determined by the Full Court.

(2.) In the hearing and determination of such appeals the Full Court shall, so far as circumstances admit, follow the practice of the Court of Criminal Appeal in England and the provisions contained in sections 1 (5), 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 11 (2), 14 (2) (3), 17, and 21 of "The Criminal Appeal Act, 1907," or of any law amending or substituted for the same.

(3.) Provided that the Full Court shall not annul a conviction or sentence, or vary a sentence, on the ground—

- (a.) Of any objection which, if stated during the trial, might, in the opinion of the Court, have been properly met by amendment at the trial; or
- (b.) Of any error in the summoning of the jury or the assessors; or
- (c.) Of any person having served as a jurymen or an assessor who was not qualified; or
- (d.) Of any objection to any person as a jurymen or assessor which might have been raised before or at the trial; or
- (e.) Of any informality in the swearing of any witness; or
- (f.) Of any error or informality which, in the opinion of the Court, did not affect the substance of the case or subject the convicted person to any undue prejudice.

(4.) The Full Court shall not award costs to either side in an appeal under this part of the Order, save in an appeal under article 7.

12. The power of the Judge of the Supreme Court, under article 119 of the Principal Order, to make rules of Court shall extend to rules for the purpose of regulating the manner of presenting appeals, as to the papers which are to be sent to the Full Court, and the transmission of the same, and generally as to the conduct of appeals and all matters connected therewith.

13. Article 52 of the Principal Order shall apply to all proceedings before the Full Court under this Order.

14. When notice has been given of any appeal or application for leave to appeal, the Judge of the Supreme Court shall, save where the trial took place before himself, have power, for reasons to be recorded in the minutes, to order that it shall be heard and determined or dealt with in the manner provided in this Order by himself alone instead of by the Full Court.

15. Where a person is convicted of any offence before any Court, if the Judge of such Court thinks fit to reserve for the consideration of the Full Court any question of law arising at the trial, he shall state a case, setting out the facts and the grounds of the conviction, and the question of law, and send or deliver it to the Registrar of the Supreme Court.

The jurisdiction of the Full Court under this article shall be exercised subject to the provisions of this Order.

16. There shall be no appeal in a criminal case to His Majesty the King in Council from a decision of the Full Court or from a decision of the Judge alone under article 14, except by special leave of His Majesty in Council.

17. Reports to the Minister under article 64 of the Principal Order of sentences of death shall not be sent until the expiration of the time allowed for an appeal, or for applying for leave to appeal, against the conviction, or, if there is an appeal, until the determination of the appeal.

Appeals to His Majesty in Council.

18. Subject to the provisions of this Order, an appeal shall lie to His Majesty in Council—

- (1.) As of right, from any final judgment of the Supreme Court made in a civil action, where the matter in dispute on the Appeal amounts to or is of the value of 500*l.* or upwards, or where the Appeal involves, directly or indirectly, some claim or question to or respecting property or some civil right amounting to or of the value of 500*l.* or upwards; and
- (2.) At the discretion of the Supreme Court, from any other judgment of the Supreme Court, whether final or interlocutory, if, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, the question involved in the Appeal is one which, by reason of its great general or public importance or otherwise, ought to be submitted to His Majesty in Council for decision.

19. Applications to the Supreme Court for leave to appeal shall be made by motion within fifteen days from the date of the judgment to be appealed from, and, unless the application is made in Court at the time when such judgment is given, the applicant shall give the opposite party notice of his intended application.

20. Leave to appeal under article 12 shall only be granted by the Supreme Court in the first instance—

- (a.) Upon condition of the appellant, within two months from the date of the hearing of the application for leave to appeal, giving security, to the satisfaction of the Court, to an amount not exceeding 500*l.*, for the due prosecution of the Appeal, and for the payment of all such costs as may become payable to the respondent in the event of the appellant's not obtaining an order granting him final leave to appeal, or of the Appeal being dismissed for non-prosecution, or of His Majesty in Council ordering the appellant to pay the respondent's costs of the Appeal (as the case may be); and
- (b.) Upon such other conditions (if any) as to the time or times within which the appellant shall take the necessary steps for the purpose of procuring the preparation of the Record and the despatch thereof to England as the Court, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, may think it reasonable to impose.

21. Where the judgment appealed from requires the appellant to pay money or perform a duty, the Supreme Court shall have power, when granting leave to appeal, either to direct that the said judgment shall be carried into execution or that the execution thereof shall be suspended pending the Appeal, as to the Court shall seem just, and in case the Court shall direct the said judgment to be carried into execution, the person in whose favour it was given shall, before the execution thereof, enter into good and sufficient security, to the satisfaction of the Court, for the due performance of such order as His Majesty in Council shall think fit to make thereon.

22. The preparation of the Record shall be subject to the supervision of the Supreme Court, and the parties may submit any disputed question arising in connection therewith to the decision of the Court, and the Court shall give such directions thereon as the justice of the case may require.

23. The Registrar, as well as the parties and their legal agents, shall endeavour to exclude from the Record all documents (more particularly such as are merely formal) which are not relevant to the subject-matter of the Appeal, and, generally, to reduce the bulk of the Record as far as practicable, taking special care to avoid the duplication of documents and the unnecessary repetition of headings and other merely formal parts of documents; but the documents omitted to be copied or printed shall be enumerated in a list to be placed after the index or at the end of the Record.

24. Where in the course of the preparation of a Record one party objects to the inclusion of a document on the ground that it is unnecessary or irrelevant, and the other party nevertheless insists upon its being included, the Record, as finally printed, shall, with a view to the subsequent adjustment of the costs of and incidental to such document, indicate in the index of papers, or otherwise, the fact that, and the party by whom, the inclusion of the document was objected to.

25. The Record shall be printed in accordance with the rules in the Schedule to this Order, and may be printed either locally or in England.

26. Where the Record is printed locally the Registrar shall, at the expense of the appellant, transmit to the Registrar of the Privy Council forty copies of such Record, one of which copies he shall certify to be correct by signing his name on, or initialling, every eighth page thereof, and by affixing thereto the seal of the Supreme Court.

27. Where the Record is to be printed in England, the Registrar shall, at the expense of the appellant, transmit to the Registrar of the Privy Council one certified copy of such Record, together with an index of all the papers and exhibits in the case. No other certified copies of the Record shall be transmitted to the agents in England by or on behalf of the parties to the Appeal.

28. Where part of the Record is printed locally and part is to be printed in England, articles 20 and 21 shall, as far as practicable, apply to such parts as are printed locally and such as are to be printed in England respectively.

29. The reasons given by the Judge, or any of the Judges, for or against any judgment pronounced in the course of the proceedings out of which the Appeal arises, shall, unless they are included in the Record, be communicated in writing by such Judge or Judges to the Registrar, and shall by him be transmitted to the Registrar of the Privy Council at the same time when the Record is transmitted.

30. Where there are two or more applications for leave to appeal arising out of the same matter, and the Supreme Court is of opinion that it would be for the convenience of the Lords of the Judicial Committee and all parties concerned that the Appeals should be consolidated, the Court may direct the Appeals to be consolidated, and grant leave to appeal by a single order.

31. An appellant, who has obtained an order granting him conditional leave to appeal, may at any time prior to the making of an order granting him final leave to appeal withdraw his appeal on such terms as to costs and otherwise as the Supreme Court may direct.

32. Where an appellant, having obtained an order granting him conditional leave to appeal, and having complied with the conditions imposed on him by such order, fails thereafter to apply with due diligence to the Supreme Court for an order granting him final leave to appeal, the Court may, on an application in that behalf made by the respondent, rescind the order granting conditional leave to appeal, notwithstanding the appellant's compliance with the conditions imposed by such order, and may give such directions as to the costs of the Appeal and the security entered into by the appellant as the Court shall think fit, or make such further or other order in the premises as, in the opinion of the Court, the justice of the case requires.

33. On an application for final leave to appeal, the Supreme Court may enquire whether notice, or sufficient notice, of the application has been given by the appellant to all parties concerned, and, if not satisfied as to the notices given, may defer the granting of the final leave to appeal, or may give such other directions in the matter as, in the opinion of the Court, the justice of the case requires.

34. An appellant who has obtained final leave to appeal shall prosecute his appeal, in accordance with the rules for the time being regulating the general practice and procedure in Appeals to His Majesty in Council.

35. Where an appellant, having obtained final leave to appeal, desires, prior to the despatch of the Record to England, to withdraw his appeal, the Supreme Court may, upon an application in that behalf made by the appellant, grant him a certificate to the effect that the Appeal has been withdrawn, and the Appeal shall thereupon be deemed, as from the date of such certificate, to stand dismissed without express order of His Majesty in Council, and the costs of the Appeal and the security entered into by the appellant shall be dealt with in such manner as the Court may direct.

36. Where an appellant, having obtained final leave to appeal, fails to show due diligence in taking all necessary steps for the purpose of procuring the despatch of the Record to England, the respondent may, after giving the appellant due notice of his intended application, apply to the Supreme Court for a certificate that the Appeal has not been effectually prosecuted by the appellant, and if the Court sees fit to grant such a certificate, the appeal shall be deemed, as from the date of such certificate, to stand dismissed for non prosecution without express order of His Majesty in Council, and the costs of the Appeal and the security entered into by the appellant shall be dealt with in such manner as the Court may direct.

37. Where at any time between the order granting final leave to appeal and the despatch of the Record to England the Record becomes defective by reason of the death, or change of status, of a party to the Appeal, the Supreme Court may, notwithstanding the order granting final leave to appeal, on an application in that behalf made by any person interested, grant a certificate showing who, in the opinion of the Court, is the proper person to be substituted or entered on the Record in place of, or in addition to, the party who has died, or undergone a change of status, and the name of such person shall thereupon be deemed to be so substituted or entered on the Record as aforesaid without express order of His Majesty in Council.

38. Where the Record subsequently to its despatch to England becomes defective by reason of the death, or change of status, of a party to the Appeal, the Supreme Court shall, upon an application in that behalf made by any person interested, cause a certificate to be transmitted to the Registrar of the Privy Council showing who, in the opinion of the Court, is the proper person to be substituted, or entered, on the Record, in place of, or in addition to, the party who has died or undergone a change of status.

39. The Case of each party to the Appeal may be printed either locally or in England, and shall in either event, be printed in accordance with the rules in the Schedule to this Order, every tenth line thereof being numbered in the margin, and shall be signed by at least one of the counsel who attends at the hearing of the Appeal, or by the party himself if he conducts his appeal in person.

40. The Case shall consist of paragraphs numbered consecutively, and shall state, as concisely as possible, the circumstances out of which the Appeal arises, the contentions to be urged by the party lodging the same, and the reasons of appeal. References by page and line to the relevant portions of the Record as printed shall, as far as practicable, be printed in the margin, and care shall be taken to avoid, as far as possible, the reprinting in the Case of long extracts from the Record. The taxing officer, in taxing the costs of the Appeal, shall, either of his own motion, or at the instance of the opposite party, enquire into any unnecessary prolixity in the Case, and shall disallow the costs occasioned thereby.

41. Where the Judicial Committee directs a party to bear the costs of an appeal incurred in China, such costs shall be taxed by the proper officer of the Supreme Court in accordance with the rules for the time being regulating taxation in the Supreme Court.

42. The Supreme Court shall execute any order which His Majesty in Council may think fit to make on an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court in like manner as any original judgment of the Supreme Court should or might have been executed.

Consular Registers of Companies.

43. A register of companies incorporated or registered in the United Kingdom or in any British possession and carrying on business in China shall be kept in the office of every consulate in China.

44. The consulate at which companies shall be registered shall be that in the district of which their chief local office is situated, or their business is chiefly carried on, and notice shall be given at the consulate of any other district in which the company is also carrying on business as to the place at which the company is so registered.

45. On the registration of a company at a consulate there shall be deposited and filed in the office of the consulate a copy of the certificate of incorporation of the company, or other document corresponding thereto, a copy of the memorandum and articles of association or other documents corresponding thereto, a statement showing the nominal capital of the company, and the amounts thereof which have been subscribed and paid up respectively, and, if the company has been incorporated under a law which provides for the periodical filing of a list of the shareholders, a copy of the last list so filed.

46. The consular officer shall, on the registration of a company at the consulate, issue to the person making the registration a certificate, signed and sealed with the consular seal, that the company has been so registered.

47.—(1.) Every company registered under this Order shall register the name and address of the manager or other chief local representative in China, and shall from time to time, as may be necessary, register any alteration of the representative of the company or in his address. Names and addresses so registered shall be open to the inspection of the public.

(2.) Rules of Court made under article 119 of the Principal Order may provide that service of writs, notices, or other documents upon the person registered under this article, or at his address, shall be good service of such documents upon the company.

48. Registration of a company under this Order shall not require to be renewed annually, but may be renewed from time to time as the parties may desire, and must be renewed when any change takes place in the name of the company.

49. On every registration of a company under this Order, and on every renewal thereof, there shall be payable a fee of 1*l.*, and on every registration under article 47 there shall be payable a fee of 2*s.*

50.—(1.) A company shall not be entitled to be recognised or protected as a British company unless it is registered under this Order, but shall, although not so registered, be subject to the jurisdiction of His Majesty's Courts in China.

(2.) Nothing in this article shall affect the right of the Secretary of State to direct that British protection shall not be accorded to a company, even though it has been registered under this Order.

Orders of a Court of Consuls.

51.—(1.) Where by agreement among the diplomatic representatives in China of foreign States, Regulations have been, or are, made for the establishment, control or procedure of a Court of Consuls, or other like Court, to deal with disputes or suits relating to the property or proceedings of any board, committee, association, or other like group of persons which has been appointed for public purposes at any treaty port or foreign settlement or concession in China, and on which other nations besides Great Britain are represented, and such Regulations have been or are approved by the Secretary of State, the jurisdiction of the said Court shall not, so far as persons subject to the Principal Order are concerned, be deemed to conflict with article 6 of the Principal Order, and the Court shall enforce on all persons subject to its jurisdiction the orders and decrees of such Court of Consuls or other like Court.

(2.) Regulations approved by the Secretary of State under this article shall be published in the same manner as King's Regulations.

52.—(1.) Articles 85, 86, 87, 115, and 116 of the Principal Order are hereby repealed, but such repeal shall not—

- (a.) Affect the past operation of such articles, or any right, title, obligation, or liability thereunder; or
- (b.) Interfere with the institution or prosecution of any legal proceedings thereunder.

(2.) Appeals in criminal cases and Appeals to His Majesty in Council commenced under any articles hereby repealed shall be continued so far as is practicable in accordance with this Order.

And the Right Honourable Sir Edward Grey, Baronet, one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, is to give the necessary directions herein.

R. D. I.
J. A. S.

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen.

Foreign Office, January 13, 1913.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit herewith the papers noted in the enclosed list, in original for return, respecting recent legislation in the United States of America and Russia to suspend, for a period of five years, the killing of seals on the Pribyloff and Commander Islands.

It will be seen that, although the Japanese Government have protested against the United States' legislation in question, Sir E. Grey has, after consideration of the circumstances, come to the conclusion that His Majesty's Government would appear to have no ground for protesting as of right against the suspension of the land-catch of seals proposed by the United States' Government.

The Board of Trade have, however, expressed the desire that you should be consulted as to whether this legislation could, in your opinion, be regarded as in conflict with the provisions of the Treaty of the 7th July, 1911, a copy of which is also enclosed, in view of the fact that it ties the hands of the United States' administration for a definite period of years.

Sir E. Grey would therefore be glad to receive your report on this point, as on the similar point arising out of the Russian legislation in regard to the Commander Islands, and to be favoured with any observations of a general character that you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, February 7, 1913.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit a letter from the Colonial Office,* enclosing a copy of a despatch from the Governor-General of the Dominion of Canada, forwarding copies of an approved Minute of the Privy Council for Canada, setting out the grounds on which the Canadian Government take exception to the prohibition of the killing of seals by the United States' Government.

Sir E. Grey would be glad if you would take this despatch into consideration with the other papers on the same subject submitted to you in the letter from this Department of the 13th ultimo.

I have, &c.
LOUIS MALLET.

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 21, 1913.

ON the 13th January last I had the honour, by direction of Sir E. Grey, to request your opinion on the right of the United States' Government to suspend for five years the killing of fur seals on the Pribyloff Islands.

I am now to transmit to you herewith copy of a Memorandum communicated by the Japanese Government,† enquiring the views of His Majesty's Government on that particular point, and to state that Sir E. Grey would be glad to receive your opinion on this matter as soon as possible.

I have, &c.
LOUIS MALLET.

Report.

In our opinion, the legislation in the United States of America and Russia suspending for five years the killing of seals on the Pribyloff and Commander Islands

* Colonial Office, February 4, 1913.

† Japanese Embassy, Memorandum of April 16, 1913.

is not in conflict with the provisions of the Treaty of the 7th July, 1911. The treaty expressly reserves to both the United States and Russia power to restrict killing or to prohibit it altogether, as may seem necessary to protect and preserve the seal herd or to increase its numbers, and an absolute prohibition for any period cannot be in conflict with the provisions of the treaty if the action of the country enacting it is a bonâ fide exercise of the discretion conferred by the treaty as above stated. There is no evidence to the contrary in the present case.

[July 8, 1913.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, February 17, 1913.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list, relative to the power of the Master of the Faculties to appoint Notaries Public to practise in places in foreign countries where His Majesty exercises extra-territorial jurisdiction.

So far as Sir E. Grey is aware, no such appointments had ever been made before the year 1910, when two gentlemen, one a member of the English Bar, and the other a solicitor, were appointed by the Master of the Faculties to practise in Shanghai. Before the appointments were made, a firm of solicitors were informed by this Department, in answer to an enquiry as to the position of Shanghai, that it was "a place where His Majesty has extra-territorial jurisdiction."

Sir E. Grey was, however, not aware of the appointments until a complaint was made (Paper (A)) by the same solicitors to the effect that His Majesty's Consul-General at Shanghai had refused to recognise the appointment of one of these gentlemen.

As a result of the correspondence which has passed between this Department and the Master of the Faculties on the subject (Papers (I), (K), (L), (M), (N), (P), (Q), and (R)), it has now been arranged that no such appointments shall be made in future. A practical question, however, remains still open, as to the treatment to be accorded to the two gentlemen who have already obtained faculties, and are still practising as Notaries Public at Shanghai.

Sir E. Fraser, His Majesty's Consul-General at Shanghai, is strongly of opinion that it is undesirable that Notaries Public should be permitted to practise at Shanghai (see Papers (B), (E), and (O)), and he has recently suggested (Paper (T)) that a notice should be issued to the public that His Majesty's diplomatic and consular officers are the only persons having authority to perform notarial acts there. Sir E. Grey fully agrees with Sir E. Fraser as to the advisability of confining the power to execute notarial acts in Shanghai to consular officers, but he would not feel justified in taking the course suggested in the case of the two gentlemen already appointed unless you should be of opinion that the appointment of Notaries Public by the Master of the Faculties to practise in such places was ultra vires.

Section 4 of "The Public Notaries Act, 1843," provides that the Master of the Faculties may require testimonials of ability, &c., from persons applying for admission as a Notary to practise in England "or in any of His Majesty's foreign territories, colonies, settlements, dominions, forts, factories, or possessions." So far as Sir E. Grey is aware, this is the only definition to be found of the places out of England in which Notaries may be appointed to practise, and the question would therefore appear to be whether any of the words quoted would cover a place in which His Majesty exercises extra-territorial jurisdiction.

The Master of the Faculties has expressed the opinion (Paper (K)) that His Majesty's jurisdiction in Shanghai brings that place within "His Majesty's foreign colonies, territories, and dominions." Sir E. Grey is advised that this contention is open at the least to very serious doubt; His Majesty exercises jurisdiction over Power of Master of Faculties to appoint Notaries to act in foreign countries where His Majesty has extra-territorial jurisdiction.

British subjects in China, as in other countries, in virtue of rights granted under treaty by the local Sovereign, or accorded by prescription and usage, but His Majesty has no sovereign rights over Shanghai such as would render that place part of "His Majesty's foreign colonies, territories, and dominions," and it must be remembered that similar rights are enjoyed in Shanghai by other foreign Sovereigns, who would, if such a contention were correct, be equally entitled to consider that place as forming part of their dominions. Such a contention would also involve the assumption that Shanghai was at the same time part of His Majesty's dominions and a foreign place to which His Majesty was entitled to appoint consular officers.

Sir E. Grey is therefore advised that the words "His Majesty's foreign territories, colonies, and dominions" only cover places within the British Empire, and the same would appear to be the case with regard to the word "possessions." It may, however, be argued that the words "settlements, forts, and factories" do cover places in foreign countries in which His Majesty exercises extra-territorial jurisdiction, and such a contention has actually been advanced by one of the gentlemen concerned (Paper (E)).

It seems clear that the words in question have not been construed as enabling the Master of the Faculties to appoint Notaries to practise outside the British Empire. The form of words used until recently in appointing Notaries to practise out of England authorised the Notary to act at the place indicated in the appointment, "and also in all other His Majesty's foreign territories, colonies, and dominions, and not in any other place whatsoever" ("Brooke's Notary," sixth edition, p. 18.) This form has now been altered, and the appointment is confined to the place specified therein (Paper (K)); but the wording of the old form would appear to indicate clearly that it was not thought that the effect of the section was to authorise the appointment of Notaries to practise in places not covered by the words "His Majesty's foreign territories, colonies, and dominions." This conclusion is also supported by the rules issued by the Court of Faculties, in which it is stated that "No service is required previous to the admission of Notaries to practise out of England (viz., in any of His Majesty's foreign territories, colonies, or dominions)" ("Brooke's Notary," sixth edition, p. 55). Reference may also be made to section 10 of the Act of 1843, prescribing penalties for unauthorised practice as a Notary, wherein it is provided that the penalty may be recovered in any of His Majesty's superior Courts of Record at Westminster, "or if the cause of action shall have arisen in any colony or place to His Majesty belonging out of England, then in the Supreme Court of Law of such colony or place."

It may be added that in "The Laws of England," volume 21, at p. 497, the law is stated as being that "The Master of the Faculties has power to issue a faculty to practise as a Notary in the British Dominions or Colonies beyond the seas."

It would therefore appear probable that the words "His Majesty's settlements, forts, and factories" were not intended to apply to places in foreign countries in which His Majesty has extra-territorial jurisdiction, and the phrase certainly seems inapplicable in view of the fact that His Majesty's rights in such places are not exclusive, but are enjoyed equally by other Sovereigns. Provision for the performance of Notarial acts in such places is made by section 6 of "The Commissioners for Oaths Act, 1889," and it may perhaps be inferred from this that Notaries cannot be appointed to practise in places where His Majesty has diplomatic or consular representation.

I am therefore to request you to take the accompanying papers into consideration, and to favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to whether Notaries Public can legally be appointed to practise in places in foreign countries where His Majesty has extra-territorial jurisdiction.

Sir E. Grey would also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general nature which you may desire to offer.

Report.

In our opinion, the operation of "The Public Notaries Act, 1843," is confined to places belonging to His Majesty, and consequently that Statute does not empower the Master of the Faculties to appoint Notaries to act in places outside the King's dominions in which His Majesty exercises foreign jurisdiction.

The power of the Archbishop, and, through him, of the Master of the Faculties, to appoint Notaries is not, however, conferred by the Act of 1843, but depends upon the 25 Henry VIII, cap. 21, which empowers the Archbishop to grant to British subjects all such faculties as had theretofore "been accustomed to be had at the See of Rome or by the authority thereof."

It is therefore necessary, in order to say exactly what are the powers of the Archbishop with regard to appointing Notaries, to ascertain what powers the Pope was accustomed to use in this behalf before 1533. Apart from records which, no doubt, exist at the Faculty Office, or in Lambeth, this is by no means easy to do with any certainty. It is clear, however, that the Pope did, before that date, appoint Notaries to act in places where he had no territorial jurisdiction and where such jurisdiction as he did possess was extra-territorial—e.g., in this country and in France. It appears also that so early, at all events, as 1681 Notaries were appointed by him to act in China, Cochin China, Turkey, Siam, and other places in the Orient (see "Dictionnaire de Droit canonique," by Durand de Maillane, 3rd edition, 1766, vol. iv, p. 144).

Assuming that the Pope did exercise the power of making appointments of Notaries to act in foreign countries, we see no ground for saying that the Act of 1533 did not confer a similar power upon the Archbishop, and in fact the form of faculty in use in England in 1691 purports to appoint the grantee to exercise the office of Notary ubique locorum (see "Codex Jur. Eccl. Angl., 1761," vol. ii, p. 1563).

On the whole, therefore, we are of opinion that the appointment of a Notary to act in a foreign country where His Majesty has extra-territorial jurisdiction is a matter which is intra vires of the Master of the Faculties.

*Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.*Foreign Marriages
Regulations, 1913.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 19, 1913.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you herewith draft Foreign Marriages Regulations,* which have been prepared in this Department, in consultation with the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, the Colonial Office, the India Office, and the Registrar-General.

The regulations consolidate and amend the three Orders in Council under "The Foreign Marriage Act, 1892," viz.: "The Foreign Marriages Order in Council, 1892," "The Foreign Marriages Order in Council, 1895," and "The Foreign Marriages Order in Council, 1903," copies of which are enclosed.†

The order of the articles has been altered so as to make it correspond with the order in which the subjects, in regard to which the King in Council is authorised by the Act to make regulations, are mentioned in section 21 of the Act.

In the following paragraphs the number first given is that of the article in the draft regulations; the second number (in brackets) is, unless otherwise stated, that of the corresponding article in the Order in Council of 1892.

Article 1 (article 4), paragraph (d) has been added. It is possible that there are countries, other than those to which reference is excluded by the first words of the article, in which a consular marriage between a British subject and a subject of the country is not prohibited.

Article 2 (article 5), paragraphs (b) and (c) have been added. The new provisions are compatible with the object of the original restriction, namely, to protect female British subjects from the danger of being disowned by their foreign husbands in the country of the latter. With regard to (b) there seems to be no objection to permitting a British consular officer to perform a ceremony of marriage between a foreigner and a woman who was a British subject, but who has acquired the nationality of the foreigner by an immediately preceding marriage with him in some other form, and has thus technically lost her right to the benefit of the Foreign Marriage Act.

In connection with this article, the Registrar-General has pointed out that it is in conflict with the General Instructions of 1907, and that he is by no means certain that a British marriage officer could refuse to solemnise a marriage on the grounds stated, if the woman to be married, being a British subject, had fulfilled the statutory conditions as to residence, &c., and possessed the full legal capacity for contracting the intended marriage, and if there was nothing to show that such intended marriage was prohibited by the law of the country to which the foreigner belonged. Sir E. Grey is alive to this difficulty, but the provision in question is so valuable that he is strongly of opinion that it should be retained. If at any time a British subject whom, in pursuance of the regulations, a marriage officer has refused to marry under article 2, takes legal proceedings to enforce the right to marry and does so with success, the regulations must of course be altered. But until such an eventuality occurs, Sir E. Grey conceives it to be conducive to the public welfare that the rule laid down in article 2 shall be acted on by marriage officers abroad.

Article 3 is identical with article 2 of the Order in Council of 1892.

Article 4 (article 1). This has been altered so as to enable an officer serving at an embassy or legation, not being the head of the mission, of rank higher than "secretary," to act as a marriage officer, such as a counsellor.

Articles 7 to 17 (article 6 of the Order in Council, 1892, and the Order in Council of 1903). The amendments contained in these articles are intended, except in the case of article 8, to afford increased facilities for giving notice of marriage, which experience has shown to be desirable.

Article 8. A question has been raised whether the existing regulations (article 6 of the Order in Council of 1892) require notice to be given, in the case mentioned, by the resident party. It was probably intended to make such notice

* The draft Regulations are embodied in the Foreign Marriages Order in Council, 1913, of which the text is in the "London Gazette" of the 28th November, 1913. (Confidential No. 10343*.)

† In addition to the papers mentioned, a copy of the General Instructions to His Majesty's consular officers, 1907 edition, was sent to the Law Officers on April 26, 1913.

obligatory, and it has always been the custom of His Majesty's consular officers to require it, in accordance with their instructions.

Articles 10 and 11 correspond with articles 1 and 2 of the Order in Council of 1903, with certain verbal alterations suggested by the Colonial Office, and with the following modifications:—

Article 10 (b) has been inserted with a view to enable a person desiring to be married under the Foreign Marriage Act, residing in a colony in which special facilities do not exist for giving notice of a marriage to be solemnised under that Act, to give notice in the manner provided by the law of that colony for the purpose of a marriage there. Under the existing regulations it is necessary for such a person, if he is unable to take up his residence for the required period at a place in which notice can be given, to obtain the special permission of the Secretary of State for the solemnisation of the marriage.

Article 11 (1). The words in article 2 (1) of the Order in Council of 1903, "who has had his or her usual place of abode for three consecutive weeks immediately preceding," have been replaced by the words "who has had his or her usual place of abode for a period of not less than one week immediately preceding."

Article 3 of the Order in Council of 1903 has been replaced by article 22 of the draft regulations.

Article 13 is new and is intended to facilitate the giving of notice of a marriage to be solemnised under the Foreign Marriage Act by persons living in (1) foreign countries in which British consular officers reside, where it is undesirable to issue marriage warrants to such officers, and (2) countries under British protection.

Article 14 makes it possible for a marriage to be solemnised by a consular officer within whose district neither of the parties has resided.

Article 15. Article 6 (1) (b) of the Order in Council, 1892, empowers the Secretary of State to give special permission for a marriage to be solemnised only in a case in which one of the parties has dwelt within the district of the marriage officer. It is desired to remove this restriction.

Article 16 (article 6 (2)). Under the existing regulations each of the parties is required to state to the marriage officer the place where the non-resident party has, within three months immediately preceding, had for three consecutive weeks his or her usual place of abode, and the notice which has been given in that place during those three weeks. This statement is to be made even in the cases (1) in which notice has been given in England or in a British colony the law of which does not require a residence of three consecutive weeks as a condition of the grant of a certificate of the giving of notice, and (2) in which the Secretary of State has given special permission, although the Secretary of State is not, by article 6 (1) (b) of the Order in Council of 1892, bound to require a residence in one place of three consecutive weeks or the giving of notice at that place. The amended article only requires the parties to state what notice has, in fact, been given as to which the marriage officer will have other evidence in the shape of the certificate or certificates produced by the parties. Form No. 2 of the schedule has been altered accordingly.

Article 18 (1) replaces article 1 of the Order in Council of 1895.

Article 18 (2), (3), and (4) (article 8 (1), (2), and (3)). Under the existing regulations it appears to be impossible to authorise British consular officers in Japan to register marriages contracted there in the form provided by Japanese law, because there is in such cases no actual "solemnisation" of marriage. There is, however, nothing in the Act itself which could prevent the registration of these marriages, and the new regulations have been made to follow the wording of the Act.

I have the honour to request that you will take the draft regulations into your consideration, and favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion as to whether their terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

Sir E. Grey would also be glad to receive any observations on the point raised by the Registrar-General in connection with article 2 of the draft regulations, or of a general nature, which you may be good enough to offer.

GENERAL.—GREECE.

Report.

In our opinion the draft regulations are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

With regard to article 2, we think that the insertion of the valuable provisions of this article may be justified under either section 21 (1) (a) or section 21 (1) (h) of "The Foreign Marriage Act, 1892," and as regulations once made and laid before Parliament are to be deemed to be within the powers of the Act by virtue of section 21 (2), no question as to the validity of this article could subsequently be raised with success.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, October 6, 1913.

Seizure of British ship
"Trevarrack"
by Greek navy.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you, in original for return, the papers noted in the annexed list relating to the case of the British steamship "Trevarrack," which was seized by the Greek navy in December last when carrying a cargo of coal consigned to Constanza.

As will be seen from the enclosed papers the vessel was stopped on the 14th December and taken in the first place to Lemnos, and later to the Piræus. The case was referred to the Greek Prize Court of First Instance, which gave judgment on the 12th January last, declaring the vessel not to be liable to capture, but recognizing that the Greek Government had a right of pre-emption over the cargo and admitting that they were entitled to class coal in the category of absolute contraband.

The Greek Government appealed against this decision, and the judgment on appeal, given on the 21st June last, whilst directing the Government to pay the value of the cargo, less the expenses of sending the ship to the Piræus, discharging her, &c., declared that no compensation was due for the ship's detention since no certificate from the Consular Authority of Roumania was on board showing that the coal was destined for consumption at a neutral port. It will be observed that the Court thus ignored the fact that the Roumanian Minister had informed the Greek Government officially that the coal was destined for the municipality of Constanza.

The circumstances of the case are such that the Secretary of State feels in considerable doubt as to whether he would be justified in making diplomatic representations to the Greek Government, as desired by the representatives of the owners, urging them to grant compensation for the detention of the vessel. The cargo, as stated above, was being conveyed to a Roumanian port, and in order to reach her destination the vessel had to pass through the Dardanelles. The Turkish Government were at the time greatly in need of coal and the Dardanelles was, in existing circumstances, practically an enemy port.

It seems to Sir E. Grey that, in view of the exceptional geographical position of the Dardanelles the Greek Government were not, in practice, acting unreasonably in requiring that ships carrying coal to neutral ports in the Black Sea should be provided with a certificate from the Legation or Consular Authority of the country of destination to the effect that the coal was intended for local consumption at the neutral port.

According to the old rules, applied in British Prize Courts, the coal would

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

AT 12.35 A.M., on the 18th August, 1912, H.M.S. "Spanker," a torpedo gunboat detailed for fishery duties in the North Sea, discovered the Belgian sailing trawler "O-100" fishing off Southwold in territorial waters. An officer was sent to her to effect her arrest for fishing within the exclusive limits, but the crew made no attempt to comply with his orders, and, instead, hastened the getting in of their trawl. As soon as this was done the trawler went about and made full sail, by which manœuvres she nearly swamped the "Spanker's" boat alongside.

It being perfectly apparent that the trawler intended to endeavour to escape, the officer returned to the "Spanker," which closed on the trawler and hailed her to come alongside and lower her sails. No attention being paid to this order, the "Spanker" went up close alongside the trawler and stopped. The trawler drifted on to the "Spanker," and her mizzen-boom caught in the starboard after-backstay of the "Spanker's" fore-topmast, carrying the topmast and the trawler's mizzen-mast away. Whilst the wreckage was being cleared, the trawler, which carried no navigation lights, got out of the rays of the searchlight, and the commanding officer of His Majesty's vessel, having sufficient evidence to identify the vessel, made no effort to follow her. In acting thus he purported to comply with Admiralty Instructions to Sea Fishery Officers, to the effect that these officers should never use force unless imperatively necessary for purposes of self-defence. The instructions further say that if fishermen maintain resistance to lawful orders, the sea-fishery officer should, after ensuring identification, report the matter to the superior naval authority.

The extent of territorial waters in the North Sea, for the purposes now in question, is fixed by the second article of the International Convention for the purpose of regulating the Police of the Fisheries in the North Sea outside Territorial Waters, scheduled to and confirmed by "The Sea Fisheries Act, 1883" (46 and 47 Vict., cap. 22).

Section 7 of this Act provides that if a foreign fishing-boat enters the exclusive fishery limits of the British Isles (defined in section 28), no person on board the boat shall fish or attempt to fish while the boat remains within those limits, and any breach of the provisions of the section renders the guilty person liable to a fine not exceeding 10*l.* in the case of a first offence or 20*l.* in the case of a subsequent offence.

Section 12 of the Act confers certain powers upon British sea-fishery officers (including all commissioned officers of any of His Majesty's ships on full pay—section 11 (2)) with respect to all sea-fishing boats within the exclusive limits of the British Islands, including the power to arrest offenders and take them and their boat to the nearest or most convenient port for trial (sub-section (8)).

Section 14 (1) incorporates certain provisions of "The Customs Consolidation Act, 1876," but not, apparently, those contained in section 181 of that Act, expressly authorising the firing at offenders. By section 14 (2), if any person obstructs any sea-fishery officer acting under the powers conferred by the Act or refuses to comply with any direction lawfully made or given, he is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding 50*l.* or three months' imprisonment with hard labour.

The Belgian trawler, in the case in question, appears to have committed two offences:—

- (a.) Trawling in British waters; and
- (b.) Resisting the lawful orders of a sea-fishery officer.

The Admiralty reported the matter to the Foreign Office, asking that Department to represent the case to the Belgian Government, with a view to action being taken against the trawler in the Belgian Courts. The Belgian Government replied in due course that the offences alleged did not fall within the convention, since that has for its object the regulation of the police of the North Sea fisheries outside territorial waters, and that therefore the Belgian Courts have no jurisdiction in the matter. This view of the Belgian Government seems correct, and has been concurred in by the Board of Trade and the Foreign Office, and the question has been raised whether the "Spanker" would have had power to have arrested the trawler by force.

There is clearly power to deal with the trawler under English law for the offences in question—power which the British Parliament are internationally recognised as entitled to exercise over their territorial waters—and the trawler, having been caught in actual contravention of the Act, might have been pursued even beyond the limits of the territorial waters. (See Westlake's "International Law," Part I, Peace, p. 173.)

The views of the Treasury Solicitor are set out in his Minute of the 11th June, 1913, to which reference may perhaps be permitted.

The use of force by one of His Majesty's vessels in such cases must, of course, be attended with more or less danger to the lives of those on board the vessel pursued, as even though, in the case of a sailing trawler, the firing might be directed at the sails, aim cannot be perfectly sure, and ricochet shots may result in unlooked-for personal injury.

The Law Officers are requested to advise the Admiralty generally as to the right to use force when necessary to effect the arrest of trawlers committing in territorial waters offences against the provisions of "The Sea Fisheries Act, 1883," including the killing or maiming of an offender who otherwise appears likely to escape capture.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

Offences against "The Sea Fisheries Act, 1883," are not felonies, and therefore the common law rule justifying the killing of a felon who is flying from justice if he cannot otherwise be overtaken has no application. By section 12 (8) of the Act, a British sea-fishery officer may, in the case of any person who appears to him to have contravened the Act, take the offender and the boat to which he belongs and the crew thereof to the nearest, or most convenient, port and detain him for the purposes of prosecution. It follows that such an officer is entitled to use force when necessary to carry out these purposes, but we do not think the statute justifies the taking of human life. Section 14 (1) of the Act cannot be read to confer by reference an indemnity upon the officer who commits such a homicide as a means of arrest, though any necessary damage short of the taking of life would be justified as flowing from the execution of an authorised act. The defence of "act of State" would not be available to excuse a homicide committed in territorial waters, although the person killed is a foreigner, since the foreigner, so long as he is in territorial waters, must be regarded as under "temporary allegiance" to the British Crown.

Sir E. Grey is advised, have been liable to capture by the Greeks in the Aegean Sea as a cargo on its way to a hostile port of naval equipment at the time of the capture; the ultimate neutral destination would have been ignored. Consequently His Majesty's Government could not reasonably raise objection to the more lenient rule introduced by the Greek Government, according to which such vessels could escape capture by carrying a particular certificate.

Sir E. Grey would be glad if you would take all the circumstances of the case into consideration and favour him with your opinion as to whether, since the judgment of the 21st June is a final one His Majesty's Government would be justified in making diplomatic representations and pressing the Greek Government to grant compensation for the detention of the vessel, and if so, on what grounds such representations could most advantageously be based. Sir E. Grey would also be glad to receive any general observations on the case which you may be good enough to offer.

Inasmuch as it is desirable that a reply should be given as soon as possible to the request for diplomatic assistance put forward on behalf of the shipowners, Sir E. Grey would be much obliged if you would favour him with your opinion at your earliest convenience.

Report.

The Judgment of the Greek Court of Appeal appears to proceed upon the basis that coal had become absolute contraband, and that the Greek Government, by its notice requiring cargoes of coal with a neutral destination to be provided with a certificate, was making a concession to traders of which they might take advantage if they liked; whereas, if a cargo with a neutral destination did not provide itself with such a certificate the ship could be detained without compensation. In our opinion, however, coal is not, and ought not, to be treated as absolute contraband; it is of the class of conditional or relative contraband, and the finding of both the Greek Courts that the bond fide destination of this coal was neutral makes the cargo in fact innocent. The question, therefore, comes to be whether the failure of the "Trevarrack" to be provided with a certificate of a neutral destination afforded such ground for stopping the ship on the suspicion that a cargo in fact innocent would turn out to be destined for the enemy, as excuses the captors from compensating the ship for detention when the true facts are ascertained.

The argument in favour of the ship and against the Greek Government would be as follows: There was in fact nothing irregular or suspicious about the ship's papers, and the Greek Government had no right to treat a cargo as open to suspicion merely because it had not been provided with a certificate which the Greek Government had been pleased to require; the ship was under no obligation to have such a certificate, and was in fact engaged on perfectly lawful trade with another neutral; a ship carrying a cargo which is in the class of conditional contraband does not render its cargo liable to seizure merely because it is calling at a hostile port on a bond fide voyage to a neutral destination; and even though the Greek Government might be entitled to bring in the ship and cargo and to exercise a right of pre-emption over the cargo in order to prevent the possibility of Turkey doing likewise when the ship reached the Dardanelles, it does not necessarily follow that the Greek Government, if they chose to exercise such a right, should not compensate a neutral ship for the injury done by her detention.

But, upon the whole, we are of opinion that the above line of argument would not prevail. A belligerent is not necessarily required to compensate a ship for detention because, when investigation has been made, cargo of doubtful character is found to be innocent. The duty to compensate the ship depends upon whether the belligerent acted unreasonably in detaining her for examination, and in view of the absence of any certificate of neutral destination after the warnings which the Greek Government had issued, and of the geographical position of the Dardanelles and the high probability that the coal would pass to Turkey if the ship were not detained, we are afraid that an International Tribunal would be likely to consider the action of the Greek Government as reasonable.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 14, 1913.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list, relative to the condemnation by the Italian Prize Court during the Turco-Italian war of certain specie seized on board the steamship "Menzaleh," a British vessel belonging to the Khedivial Mail Steamship and Graving Dock Company (Limited). The facts of the case are as follows:—

Steamship
 "Menzaleh": Condemnation of specie by Italian Prize Court.

The "Menzaleh," which is stated by the Khedivial Line to run between Suez and Aden, was carrying 30,000*l.* in specie belonging to the Imperial Ottoman Bank, consigned in equal amounts to two private firms at Hodeidah. On the 21st December, 1911, she was stopped off Jeddah and searched by the Italian cruiser "Calabria," and the specie in question was removed. A further sum of money, consigned by the Ottoman post-office at Smyrna to the Ottoman post-office at Hodeidah, was also removed, but with this His Majesty's Government are not concerned. The "Menzaleh" was then allowed to proceed.

In view of the provisions of articles 44 and 54 of the Declaration of London, the principles of which instrument the Italian Government had stated that it was their intention to observe, His Majesty's Government did not raise any formal objection to the action of the Italian naval authorities in taking that course, instead of bringing the steamer in for adjudication before an Italian Prize Court. Sir R. Rodd was, however, instructed to impress upon the Italian Government that it was incumbent upon them to institute proceedings in their Prize Court, and there establish the fact that the gold was contraband (Paper (B)).

The Italian Government at first contended that the specie in question was the property of the Turkish Government, and that its seizure was justifiable in accordance with the principle embodied in article 53 of the regulations annexed to the convention concerning the laws and customs of war on land, signed at The Hague in 1907, and that there was, therefore, no reason why the seizure should be submitted to the decision of a Prize Court (Paper (F)). This view was contested by His Majesty's Government, who pointed out that the article in question, relating as it does to war upon land, had no bearing upon cases of maritime capture, and stated that in their opinion the matter was governed entirely by the doctrine of article 2 of the Declaration of Paris, viz., that the neutral flag covers enemy goods, with the exception of contraband of war, and that whether a particular article was or was not contraband of war was a question exclusively for the decision of a Prize Court. It was added that it might well be that His Majesty's Government would be unable to admit the contention that the money was the property of the Ottoman Government, but in any event it would seem to have no material bearing on the case, except in so far as might concern the elucidation of the question whether the specie was contraband or not (Paper (G)). The Italian Government then referred the case to the Prize Court (Paper (J)).

The gold was insured by the Marine Insurance Company, of London, to whom the Imperial Ottoman Bank immediately abandoned their rights, and the underwriters paid the full sum for which the gold was insured, and entered a claim in the Prize Court for the release of the 30,000*l.* The question was then raised by the Italian Government whether the underwriters were entitled to intervene in the case (Paper (M)), and the Prize Court finally determined to permit the underwriters to appear in the proceedings, while reserving its decision as to the admissibility of their intervention until judgment was pronounced on the whole case (Paper (Q)).

Final judgment was given in September 1912 (Paper (W)). The judgment is very long, but the findings of the Court may be summarised as follows:—

1. That the underwriters have no locus standi, and are not entitled to enter a claim.
2. That the specie was the property of the Ottoman Government, and therefore derives no protection from article 2 of the Declaration of Paris.
3. That the specie was contraband of war.

Sir E. Grey is advised that no appeal is open from this decision.

Messrs. Waltons and Co., the solicitors for the underwriters, instructed Mr. F. E. Bray, barrister-at-law, of the Inner Temple and the South-Eastern Circuit, who had followed the case, on their instructions, from the outset on behalf of their clients, and had paid two visits to Rome to confer with the Italian lawyers retained, to prepare a memorandum embodying his observations on the judgment, and they have been good enough to supply Sir E. Grey with a copy of it (Paper (X)). Sir E. Grey is advised that the arguments and conclusions of Mr. Bray's memorandum are sound, and afford a useful exposition of the matter with which it deals.

In view of the great importance to British interests of the principles laid down in the judgment, especially the interpretation placed upon article 2 of the Declaration of Paris, Sir E. Grey considered it advisable to ascertain the views of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and the Board of Trade (Paper (Y)), and their replies are transmitted herewith (Papers (AA) and (CC)). Of the three findings of the Prize Court that numbered (2) above is by far the most important, and will be considered first. The Court held that the immunity conferred by article 2 of the Declaration of Paris on enemy property (with the exception of contraband of war) under a neutral flag only extends to private enemy property, and does not cover property of the enemy State. The same principle was affirmed by the Prize Court in two other cases, the "Newa" and the "Sheffield." Translations of the judgments in these two cases are transmitted herewith (Papers (GG) and (HH)), but the point is much more fully considered in the judgment in the case of the "Menzaleh." The references to this point will be found on pp. 11 and 12 of the judgment in the case of the "Newa," and on pp. 10 and 11 of that in the case of the "Sheffield." In these two cases the decisions of the Court can be supported on other grounds, and Sir E. Grey does not propose to take any action, except in so far as it may be necessary to do so in connection with the interpretation put upon article 2 of the Declaration of Paris.

It is clear that the effect of the decision in the case of the "Menzaleh" on this point will be to make the position of neutral ship-owners much more difficult. As the Board of Trade point out (Paper (AA)), it has never previously been held open to doubt that goods can only be contraband or liable to seizure by virtue of either their nature or their destination. To import the test of ownership is to deprive neutral ship-owners of all security, for it is usually impossible for any ship-owner to determine the true ownership of the goods he carries. It would also be possible, when this country was neutral, for an enterprising belligerent very considerably to hamper our trade by sending in vessels for adjudication on suspicion of carrying State property.

Nor does it appear that the adoption of the principle laid down by the Italian Prize Court would be to the advantage of this country when at war. If admitted it would be equivalent to a very great extension of the doctrine of contraband, as under such a definition all State property of whatever description would be liable to seizure, and its effect upon the provisions of the Declaration of London might necessitate the remodelling of that agreement. As a belligerent, it would enable this country to seize all enemy goods that could be in any way suspected of being State property; but this would only be a nominal advantage, as the State ownership would be a fact extremely difficult of proof, and unless there was irrebuttable evidence the captors could not hope to succeed in a British Prize Court. It is not to the interests of this country to raise in war disputable questions of this nature with neutrals, having in view the doubtful advantage likely to be derived from it; and, moreover, it is highly undesirable to give an enemy an excuse for interfering with neutral trade coming to British ports in time of war. It has sometimes been contended that the Declaration of Paris is a serious obstacle to the enforcement of British sea power in time of war. From this point of view a decision which makes such an inroad upon the principles of that instrument should rather be welcomed, but Sir E. Grey does not share this view, and you will observe that the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty hesitate to give an opinion upon the question whether it might be an advantage to this country, as a potential belligerent, that the authority of the Declaration of Paris shall be undermined until it is clear that there is a prospect of the abandonment of the Declaration as a matter of practical politics. They presume, however, that an instrument which has lasted so long, and by general acceptance has been raised to a doctrine of international law, must be regarded as a permanent security for the rights of neutral shipping, which neutral States—always certain to be in a majority during war—will never to any serious extent renounce in favour of the belligerents (Paper (CC)).

Sir E. Grey is therefore of opinion that the interests of this country, both as a neutral and as a belligerent, require that the decision of the Italian Prize Court on this point—which, if left unchallenged, would constitute a precedent—should be contested, and that a protest should be addressed to the Italian Government and the reference of the question to arbitration requested, should you be of opinion that this course may properly be adopted.

The judgment contains a lengthy argument in defence of the interpretation adopted of article 2 of the Declaration of Paris, but no precedents are quoted in support of it. I am to call attention to the criticisms of these arguments contained in Mr. Bray's memorandum (Paper (X)), with which Sir E. Grey is disposed to agree. So far as he is aware, the point has never been raised in practice before, but it would appear that the terms of the article have usually been considered to cover State property as well as private property. On this point I am to refer to the opinion of Professor Holland (Paper (FF)), of which a copy has kindly been supplied by Messrs. Waltons and Co., who consulted him in connection with this case. The only pronouncement in favour of the interpretation adopted by the Italian Prize Court with which Sir E. Grey is acquainted is a passage in Rivier ("Principes du Droit des Gens," vol. ii, p. 429): "Quant à la propriété de l'État ennemi, il va de soi qu'elle n'est point couverte par le pavillon neutre; même trouvée sur le navire neutre, elle est butin." This opinion is, however, considered to be untenable by Professor Oppenheim. ("International Law," 2nd edition, vol. ii, p. 220, note.)

There is one other point in connection with this part of the case. It has been suggested (Paper (Z)) that it is doubtful whether the word "marchandise" in article 2 of the Declaration of Paris is wide enough to cover specie. You will observe that the Board of Trade are of opinion that the interests of this country are deeply involved in maintaining the doctrine that the article in question covers goods of all kinds other than contraband, whether such "goods" consist of merchandise in the more limited sense of the word or of specie (Paper (A A)). In this connection I am to point out that in the English version of the article the word "marchandise" is translated "goods," and, so far as Sir E. Grey is aware, it has never previously been suggested that the French word was used in a narrower sense; further, the word "marchandise" is used in article 3 of the Declaration, and if in that article the word were construed in the same restricted sense the result would be rather surprising.

Before leaving this part of the case, I am to say that Sir E. Grey is not, as at present advised, prepared to accept the finding of the Prize Court to the effect that the status of the Imperial Ottoman Bank was such that gold belonging to it was the property of the Turkish Government, but if you are of opinion that the interpretation of article 2 of the Declaration of Paris adopted by the Court was wrong this question will not arise.

Passing now to the finding of the Court numbered (3) above, that the specie in question was contraband of war, I am to point out that there is little doubt that the specie was destined to the Turkish Government authorities, and there can be no question that the Italian Government would have been entitled to declare specie to be contraband of war, but, in Sir E. Grey's opinion, the declaration of contraband issued by the Italian Government can by no process of fair interpretation be made to cover specie. This declaration (as published in the "London Gazette") is transmitted herewith (Paper (DD)), and the same list of contraband articles is given in article 6 of the Italian Decree as to Capture and Prize (Paper (EE)). You will observe that the list, after mentioning various articles, all of which are undoubtedly absolute contraband, adds "everything which, without manipulation, can serve directly for land or sea armament," or, as it is otherwise translated, "everything which, without manipulation, can be put to immediate use in connection with land or maritime warfare." Taken by themselves, these words might include some articles of conditional contraband, but, as Mr. Bray points out (Paper (X)), they must be construed as ejusdem generis with the articles specifically mentioned, and thus be limited to absolute contraband. Further, the second paragraph of article 6 of the Decree as to Capture and Prize appears to place the matter beyond doubt by stating that such articles are subject to capture, if their destination is the enemy's territory, a rule which is only applicable to absolute contraband.

This being so, Sir E. Grey does not consider that the finding of the Court on this point can be justified by a reference to the Declaration of London, as the Italian Government had issued a list of articles to be considered as contraband which was not identical with that contained in the Declaration of London, and they are therefore not entitled to rely on the latter list in order to condemn articles which are not contained in the former. In any case, the preamble to the Decree as to Capture and Prize states that the principles of the Declaration of London are to be observed "in so far as the dispositions of the laws of the kingdom allow," and Sir E. Grey understands that the list of contraband given in the Italian Code is identical with that contained in article 6 of the decree. He is therefore of opinion that British subjects who acted on the faith of the Italian declaration as to contraband are entitled to any assistance that His Majesty's Government can give them.

As regards the finding of the Court numbered (1) above to the effect that the underwriters had no locus standi and were not entitled to enter or claim, Sir E. Grey is advised that the proper course would have been that the proceedings should have been taken by the underwriters in the name of the Imperial Ottoman Bank, and that there can be no question as to the right of the underwriters to exercise, in the name of the bank, whatever rights of claim in the Prize Court the latter had, and there would appear to be considerable force in Mr. Bray's contention (Paper X) that the objection should have been raised at the outset, when there was still time for this course to have been adopted. There were three cases before the Russian Prize Courts during the Russo-Japanese war, in which underwriters were allowed to appear and present claims, the "Ikhona," the "St. Kilda," and the "Prinsesse Marie" (see "Russian and Japanese Prize Cases," vol. 1, pp. 226, 188, and 276 respectively), and there were similar cases before the Japanese Prize Courts.

A reference to the report in the case of the "Ikhona" will show that the Italian Prize Court was mistaken in supposing that the insurance companies were not claimants in the first instance.

As to the contention in the judgment that the Imperial Ottoman Bank, as a department of the enemy Government, could have no locus standi, and was absolutely debarred from appearing before the Prize Courts of the other belligerent, Sir E. Grey does not consider that the Imperial Ottoman Bank can properly be described as a department of the Turkish Government, or its property as the property of that Government. In any case the proper view would appear to be that, if property is entitled to be released, the owner is entitled to come before the Prize Court and claim it, whether that owner be the enemy State or not. If not, it would appear that property can be rendered liable to condemnation by depriving the owner of the right to appear and claim it. As Mr. Bray points out (Paper X), the difficulty has arisen in the English Courts in cases where the claimant was a private enemy subject, and has been overcome on proving locus standi, and Sir E. Grey understands that in certain cases before the Japanese Prize Courts Russian subjects were allowed to present claims.

I am to request that you will take these papers into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir Edward Grey with your opinion on the following points:—

1. Whether the interpretation placed upon article 2 of the Declaration of Paris by the Italian Prize Court is correct.

2. Whether the word "merchandise" in that article can be held to cover specie.

3. Whether, in the circumstances of this case, the Court was right in holding the specie to be contraband of war.

4. Whether the Court was right in holding that the underwriters had no locus standi and were not entitled to enter a claim.

5. Whether the circumstances of the case are such as to justify His Majesty's Government in making representations to the Italian Government and in requesting a reference to arbitration, and, if so, on what grounds such representations could most advantageously be based.

Sir E. Grey would also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer upon the papers now submitted for your consideration.

Inasmuch as it is obviously important that any representations which may be thought desirable should be addressed to the Italian Government as soon as possible, Sir E. Grey would be very grateful if he could be favoured with your report at your early convenience.

I have, &c.

Report.

1 and 2. In our opinion, the interpretation placed upon article 2 of the Declaration of Paris by the Italian Prize Court is not correct. The point made by the Court as to the word "merchandise" does not appear to us to be that "merchandise" does not include specie, but that the word is not apt to describe State property. We do not think that this construction is correct, for there is no reason for supposing that the word is used in article 2 in any different sense from that in which it is used in article 3, and if in article 3 the meaning of the word is confined to private property as distinguished from State property, article 3 would permit of the property of a neutral State being seized from an enemy ship, which would be an extraordinary result. The similar argument based upon the result which would follow if "merchandise" was construed as not including specie, leads us to the conclusion that specie is intended to be included, and that the word is really properly translated by the English word goods.

3. In our opinion, the Court was wrong in holding the specie to be contraband of war. The view taken by the Court that the Declaration and Decree of the Italian Government with regard to contraband were wide enough to include conditional contraband, is not, in our opinion, correct, though the strongest argument for holding that conditional contraband is not included, namely, the argument that if it is that Declaration and Decree would constitute an infraction of Italy's treaty obligations to the United States of America under the Treaty of 1871 and to all other countries who, like Great Britain, are entitled to the benefits of that Treaty by virtue of a most-favoured-nation clause, does not appear to have been brought to the attention of the Court.

4. In our opinion, the Court was right in holding that the underwriters had no locus standi for the reason that their assured—the Ottoman Bank—whether it can be regarded as identical with the Ottoman Government or not, must be regarded as of Ottoman nationality, and consequently an alien enemy qua the Italian Court, and as such (there being no suggestion of any peculiar circumstances which, pro hac vice, discharge them from their enemy character) not entitled to make a claim before the Italian Court.

ITALY.—PERSIA.

5. In view of the want of locus standi on the part of the claimants, it appears to us that no useful purpose would be served by attempting to get the claim of the underwriters referred to arbitration.

We think, however, that diplomatic representations might fairly be made to Italy, pointing out that if the decision of the Italian Prize Court as to the meaning and intention of the Italian Decree and Declaration as to contraband is correct, then that Decree and Declaration constituted an infraction by Italy of her Treaty obligations above referred to, but that if, on the other hand, the Court has gone wrong in its interpretation of the Decree, the specie should not have been seized at all, and contending that in either event the 30,000*l.* should be returned to His Majesty's Government as having been wrongfully taken from a British ship.

It is possible that if the Italians dispute this contention the question so arising between them and His Majesty's Government might be made the subject of a request for arbitration, but that is a matter upon which we could better express an opinion when the precise grounds taken by the Italian Government have been made manifest.

We would point out that neither in such an arbitration nor in an arbitration as to the claim of the underwriters would the question of the construction of article 2 of the Declaration of Paris have necessarily to be decided, but we see no reason why, if it is considered desirable to enter a protest against the decision of the Prize Court upon this point, such a protest should not be included in the representations which we have suggested might be made with regard to this matter.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Expansion of note circulation of Imperial Bank of Persia.

WITH reference to your report of the 23rd December last, on the subject of the proposal of the Imperial Bank of Persia to increase its note circulation, I have the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State, to transmit to you further papers, noted in the accompanying list, from which it appears that a premium of 2*l.* per share, or 200,000*l.* in all, was the sum paid to the late Baron Julius de Reuter for the acquisition of the concession.

Sir E. Grey would therefore propose, subject to your concurrence, to inform the Imperial Bank that he has carefully considered the matter in consultation with the Law Officers of the Crown, and that he is of opinion that the bank has the right to expand its note circulation to 1,100,000*l.* only and not to 1,300,000*l.* as was the intention of the directors. He would add that the reason for this opinion is that the paid-up capital of the company (650,000*l.*), less the sum paid for the concession (200,000*l.*), amounts to 450,000*l.*, and that therefore the difference between the metallic reserve (650,000*l.*), and the amount of the notes in circulation must not exceed that sum (450,000*l.*).

I am to request you to be good enough to take the Papers into your consideration and to inform the Secretary of State at your early convenience, whether in your opinion the terms of the proposed reply to the Imperial Bank of Persia are right and proper in the circumstances, or whether, and if so to what extent, they can advantageously be amended or modified.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, January 9, 1913.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you herewith the draft of an Order in Council to be entitled "The Siam Order in Council, 1913." Siam Order in Council,
1913.

In explanation of the terms of the draft, I am to state that it has been drawn up with a view to meeting two points, first, the inability of the Secretary of State to reduce a sentence passed by the Court for Siam except on the recommendation of the Judge of that Court, and, second, the necessity of amending the provision which authorises the issue of Rules of Court by the Judge.

With reference to the first point, cases have arisen in which it has been desirable that the Secretary of State should be in a position of his own initiative to remit or reduce a sentence passed by a Court in Siam, and article 2 of the draft is designed to meet this contingency.

Having regard to the second point, I am to explain that the Judge of the Court for Siam, while technically remaining the Judge of the British Court for the purpose of dealing with certain special cases which might, under the present arrangement, still come before the Court, is now in the service of the Siamese Government and receives no pay from His Majesty's Government. It is consequently undesirable that he should in any respect, that it is not absolutely essential, be called upon to exercise functions appertaining to his nominal post of British Judge. As it will shortly, and may again in the future, become necessary to issue Rules of Court under the Siam Orders in Council it is proposed to transfer the powers at present held by the Judge in this respect to His Majesty's Minister at Bangkok, and article 3 of the draft has been drawn up with this end in view.

I am to request that you will take the draft order into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey at your earliest convenience with your opinion whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

I have, &c.

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, January 31, 1913.

Panamá Canal: as to whether a port on the island of Naos should be regarded as a port in the Canal or in the Canal Zone.

ON the 12th January of last year I had the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to request your opinion on certain matters connected with the tolls to be levied in the Panamá Canal. In the last paragraph of your report, dated the 19th March last (Paper A), you stated that for the purpose of the rule as to coastwise traffic a distinction is to be drawn between ports in the Canal and those which, whilst in the Canal Zone, are not in the Canal.

In the penultimate paragraph of the enclosed despatch (Paper B) His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington enquires whether a port constructed on a certain island near the Pacific entrance to the Canal and connected with the mainland by a breakwater should be regarded as a port in the Canal or in the Canal Zone.

UNITED STATES.

The limits of the Canal Zone are defined in the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panamá, signed on the 18th November, 1903 (Paper C). The positions of the island and of the proposed breakwater are shown on the annexed map (Paper D), published by the Isthmian Canal Commission, while the nature of the work to be carried out, length of breakwater, &c., are given on p. 22 of the Official Handbook of the Panamá Canal for 1911 (Paper E).

Sir E. Grey would be obliged if you would take these papers into your consideration, and favour him with your opinion on the question raised by Mr. Bryce as to the status of ports on the island of Naos and adjacent islands, and with any observations which you may desire to offer on the matter generally.

I have, &c.

Report.

The question whether a port in the island of Naos should be regarded as a port on the Canal, or as a port merely within the Canal Zone, is largely one of fact. It appears from the Official Handbook of the Panamá Canal that the Canal is regarded as extending not only from shore line to shore line, but from deep water to deep water, and it appears to us, from the map, to extend at least as far as the island of Naos. Moreover, the breakwater which is to extend from the mainland to the island would, we think, fall within the meaning of article 3 (6) of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, and so be deemed to form part of the Canal. In view of these considerations, we think it might fairly be urged that a port on the west side of the island was a port on the Canal. If the port were on the east side, we think it would be on the other side of the line distinguishing ports on the Canal from ports which, though within the Canal Zone, are not on the Canal.

[August 24, 1914.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

Minute.

1. I THINK it should be pointed out that alien enemies who are resident in this country or in allied or neutral countries should for all the purposes to which this letter relates be treated in the same way as British subjects. Any question that may arise can only be as to alien enemies resident in hostile countries.

2. As regards the last class of alien enemies, I think that both transfers from them into the names of others and transfers from others into their names should be registered if the actual sale in pursuance of which the transfer is lodged took place before the outbreak of war, that is, 11 P.M. on the 4th August or, in the case of Austria, 12 P.M. on the 12th August. It would probably be impossible for the company to enquire in every case at what date the contract took place. They might perhaps be advised, as a practical measure, to register all transfers lodged before a certain date to be fixed with reference to the probability that the contracts must have been made before the outbreak of war.

3. As regards the position of alien enemies resident in a hostile country who are registered as shareholders, payment of dividends to them is not, in my opinion, prohibited by the proclamation, and is, therefore, expressly authorised by it; their right to sue is suspended by the war, but will revive on peace being made; payment of such dividends is not entering into any new contract or obligation, but is merely giving effect to rights accruing under an existing contract or obligation. Similarly with regard to the delivery of certificates and the right of such shareholders to vote; apart from any special provisions in the constitution of the company, I do not see why they have not this right; but I think that it is perhaps hardly for the Government to advise the company on this matter. It is not likely that any alien enemies will be able to exercise this right except those who are resident in this country under licence from the Crown.

A. H. D.

The Treasury Solicitor has been furnished through the Committee on Trading with the Enemy with copies of the subjoined extracts of correspondence between the Attorney-General and the secretary of the English company:—

Letter from Secretary of an English Company to Attorney-General.

Sir,

I am instructed to ask for direction in the following circumstances, in view of the fact that this country is at war with Germany:—

This company is about to pay a dividend. We have on our books a number of shareholders with German names and German addresses; we have, again, shareholders whose names appear to be German, but who have English addresses, or from whom we have instructions to pay banks in England. What is the company's position with regard to these shareholders? Are we to hold back their dividends on the ground that they are alien enemies, or should the amounts be paid? Do you discriminate between those who have German addresses and those who give English addresses, or instructions to pay English banks or German banks who have London offices?

GENERAL.

Reply of the Attorney-General.

I have your letter of the 14th August. It seems to me that you should not transmit dividends to shareholders who have a German or Austrian address; shareholders with English addresses, whether their names are English or foreign, should be paid. English people who are residing in Germany should for this purpose be treated in the same way as Germans residing in Germany. Of course, the dividends still belong to them, but they are not payable while the war lasts and ought not to be paid; presumably you will pay the amounts into a bank in trust for such of your shareholders as are alien enemies in this sense. I think this is the right rule to follow, even although you have instructions from an alien enemy to pay his dividend into an English bank or into the London office of a German bank; for these instructions are rendered inoperative by the outbreak of war.

The Law Officers are referred to the proclamation prohibiting certain tradings with the enemy, dated the 5th August, 1914, p. 6184 of the "London Gazette." The payment of dividends to alien enemies might well be a dealing with such enemies contrary to the common law, but it does not seem to be prohibited by the proclamation, which, so far as relevant, is confined to the entry into new commercial, financial, or other contracts or obligations. It would seem that on the construction of the proclamation payment of the dividends, at all events to those who were shareholders before the outbreak of the war, is expressly permitted by the proclamation. The same observations would appear to apply to the registration of transfers to or from alien enemies on contracts entered into before the outbreak of war.

It may perhaps be mentioned that it was the intention of Lord Desart's Committee on Trading with the Enemy, on whose advice the proclamation was framed, that dividends should be paid to enemy shareholders. (See p. 14 of their report.)

It is, of course, clear that enemy shareholders cannot, during the war, enforce the right to payment of a dividend, and it is also clear that their right, so far as it arises out of shares which they held before the war, is suspended and not extinguished by the war. It may be nevertheless open for English companies if they think fit to pay these shareholders, and it appears from the report of Lord Desart's Committee that some commercial and financial interests in the city were in favour of discharging obligations to alien enemies on the ground of the general effect on British credit of failure to do so. This was particularly the case with insurance companies.

The question therefore may become one of policy whether the payments, although not enforceable, are lawful and should be made, or whether it is better policy to take advantage of the fact that they cannot be enforced and to decline to make them during the war.

The Law Officers of the Crown are requested to advise the Treasury on the following points:—

1. Whether the payment of dividends on shares held by alien enemies as above defined is permissible by law.
 2. Whether transfers to or from alien enemies of shares in English companies can or must be registered by the company:—
 - (a.) When made on contracts for sale entered into before the outbreak of war.
 - (b.) When made on contracts for sale entered into after the outbreak of war.
 3. Generally on the question of policy, and otherwise on the case.
- See printed extract from "Times" of the 22nd August, paragraph 4.

(Extract.)

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY.

Official Guidance for British Firms.

The following official announcement was issued by the Treasury last night:—

Some doubts having arisen as to the meaning and application of the proclamation against trading with the enemy, the Government authorise the following explanation to be published:—

1. For the purpose of deciding what transactions with foreign traders are permitted, the important thing is to consider where the foreign trader resides and carries on business, and not the nationality of the foreign trader.

2. Consequently, there is, as a rule, no objection to British firms trading with German or Austrian firms established in neutral or British territory. What is prohibited is trade with any firms established in hostile territory.

3. If a firm with headquarters in hostile territory has a branch in neutral or British territory, trade with the branch is (apart from prohibitions in special cases) permissible as long as the trade is bonâ fide with the branch, and no transaction with the head office is involved.

4. Commercial contracts entered into before war broke out with firms established in hostile territory cannot be performed during the war, and payments under them ought not to be made to such firms during the war. Where, however, nothing remains to be done save to pay for goods already delivered, or for services already rendered, there is no objection to making the payment. Whether contracts entered into before war are suspended or terminated is a question of law which may depend on circumstances, and in cases of doubt British firms must consult their own legal advisers.

This explanation is issued in order to promote confidence and certainty in British commercial transactions; but it must be understood that, in case of need, the Government will still be free to impose stricter regulations or special prohibitions in the national interest.

August 22, 1914.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

1. We do not think dividends declared after war broke out ought to be paid to shareholders resident in hostile territory; we think they should be dealt with as suggested in the Attorney-General's letter above set out. This is the common law rule, and even if the King's proclamation could vary the common law rule (which seems doubtful), we are not satisfied on the language of the proclamation (which is difficult to construe) that such payments are authorised. As regards dividends declared and made payable before the outbreak of war, payment cannot be compelled during war, but inasmuch as payment ought to have been made before war began, we should have thought immediate payment might be permitted.

2. (a.) Yes; this seems proper, for registration in such circumstances is a purely ministerial act—but registration during war could not be compelled.

(b.) No.

3. It is rather unfortunate that a number of conflicting opinions should have been promulgated on this point, and we would suggest that all the departments concerned should be notified of the present opinion if the Treasury decide to act on it. The Attorney-General before sending his letter on the subject took steps to ascertain whether it was in a form consistent with the practice of the Committee on Trading with the Enemy, and understood that, as finally settled, it expressed the general view.

Commercial domicil in extra-territorial States.

YOUR telegram No. 6.

I have told British subjects hitherto that ordinary business transactions completed in China are not prohibited, but that "commercial domicil" is modified by extra-territoriality, one effect of which is to close to enemy suitors the Courts which have exclusive jurisdiction over belligerent residents; and so contracts are suspended or extinguished on outbreak of war. There is no means during war of enforcing new contracts, and enemy goods except in neutral bottoms are at sea liable to capture and confiscation. I have declined to protest against bills of exchange for enemy banks. Our banks in their own interest insist on bills of exchange for shipments being drawn on British subjects, but they release cargo hypothecated to them, as it is paid for by enemy firms. Our shipping companies will not carry enemy goods by sea, and will not accept guarantee of enemy bank for release of import cargo for which bills of lading have not been produced.

Transactions with local branches of enemy firms here are almost always on account and for benefit of firms in enemy country and concern imports and exports by sea by and to enemy subjects. May transfers of shares in our companies registered in Hong Kong, other Colonies, and in England be registered as usual here?

Repeated to Peking.

Minute by Mr. Malkin.

I confess that I have serious doubts whether the view expressed in the first paragraph of this telegram is right, but I have met it in various quarters.

I assume that these Germans have a commercial domicil in Shanghai. We have been carefully explaining to everyone (see the back papers) that it is permissible for British subjects to trade with such persons, because they are "resident or carrying on business" in a neutral country—viz., China. We must therefore take it that commercial domicil is not "modified by extra-territoriality" so far as trading is concerned. Is it so modified in connection with the right to sue in a British Court? I cannot see why it should be; the British Consular Court has to apply the principles of English law; according to English law an enemy subject resident in a neutral country can sue in an English Court. Therefore, to justify Sir E. Fraser's statement, it is necessary to say that a German resident at Shanghai is not resident in a neutral country, and this seems to involve the proposition that a German resident in Shanghai is, because of his ex-territorial rights, really resident in German territory. I cannot believe that this is right. It might be possible to argue in support of the proposition if the German were resident, e.g., at Hankow, where I believe the Germans regard their concession as German territory, but this does not apply at Shanghai.

It seems to me that if Sir E. Fraser's view is accepted it knocks a large hole in the permission to trade, because a German is unlikely to enter into a contract if he knows that he cannot enforce it in the British Consular Court. On the other hand, we do not know what view the German Consular Court will take; it is probable that it would adopt the principle of nationality and exclude all English plaintiffs. There is thus a question of policy involved, and it will be noted that Sir E. Fraser seems to think that most transactions with German firms in Shanghai are transactions with firms whose head office is in Germany. Such transactions we presumably do not want to encourage, but it would depend on the circumstances of each case whether the German would be regarded as resident, for this purpose, in Germany or at Shanghai.

Foreign Office, September 17, 1914.

5

Minute by Sir E. Davidson.

(1.)

The general rule is that in time of war the question whether a person is or is not to be considered for the purposes of trade and commerce an alien enemy is to be determined by reference not to his nationality or allegiance but to his trading residence, or, as it is called, his "commercial domicil." Speaking generally, then, a German resident and trading in a neutral State is to be regarded as for commercial purposes a neutral, even though Germany be at war with England.

Does the fact that the particular neutral State involved is an oriental State, in which both Germany and Great Britain possess extra-territorial jurisdiction, materially affect the question?

If "commercial domicil" were identical in every respect with ordinary civil domicil I think it would affect the problem, for the better opinion since the decision in the case of Abdul Messih v. Farra (Appeal Cases XIII, 431) seems to be that an Anglo-Oriental domicil is inconsistent with membership of an extra-territorial seceded community (see Hall, "Foreign Jurisdiction of the British Crown," pp. 183-184), such as the German and British communities in Turkey or in China.

But, as Dicey points out ("Conflict of Laws," 2nd edition, p. 745), a person may concurrently have a civil domicil in one country and a "commercial domicil" in another; whereas, as is well known, so far as civil domicil is concerned, a person can at each moment of his life have one, and only one, domicil.

The fact that a person can have at one and the same time a "commercial domicil" as well as a civil domicil is not inconsistent with the rule that he cannot at the same time have more than one civil domicil. It merely illustrates, as Dicey again points out, that residence is different from (civil) domicil, and that a person while civilly domiciled in one country may in fact reside and carry on business in another.

In the present case, assuming (exempli gratia) that the civil domicil of these persons is German, and that they were permanently residing in Sweden for the purpose of carrying on business, they would without doubt have their "commercial domicil" in Sweden, which "commercial domicil" would be neutral.

As they are carrying on business within the Chinese Republic in analogous circumstances there seems to be no reason for holding that they cannot possess a Chinese commercial domicil. They are not carrying on business within the seceded German extra-territorial community in China but in China itself, which is the country of their trade residence.

This point is much the more important of the two which are raised in the first sentence of Mr. Fraser's telegram. For the reasons given I have come to the same conclusion as Mr. Malkin about it. It is, however, a matter of great practical importance, as well as of some theoretical difficulty, and I think that the Attorney-General should see these papers and be asked to be good enough to give his opinion on them.

With regard to the second question, viz., the right of the German to have access to the British extra-territorial Court, I think that this depends in principle, so far as English law is concerned, on whether his "commercial domicil" in respect of the transactions in dispute is neutral or hostile; but if Germany, in the converse case, would apply the test of nationality and not the test of residence for purposes of trade a British plaintiff would not get reciprocity in the German Court, and a question of policy would then arise.

W. E. D.

Foreign Office, September 30, 1914.

Opinion of the Attorney-General.

I agree with the view expressed by Sir Edward Davidson and Mr. Malkin.

The effect of residence by an Englishman in China on his civil domicil was fully considered by Chitty, J., in In re Tootal's Trusts, 23 Ch., D. 532. There it was contended that the jurisdiction of the English Courts and England's other treaty rights resulted in such residence conferring an "Anglo-Chinese" domicile. Chitty, J., held that these extra-territorial privileges did not affect the question of domicile, as the sovereignty over the soil at Shanghai remained vested in the Emperor of China. That decision was expressly approved in Abd-ul-Messih v. Farra, 13 A.C., 431.

There is no authority for the suggestion that these extra-territorial rights affect commercial domicile any more than they do civil domicile. So to hold would be to introduce a new distinction between civil and commercial domicile which has never been suggested by any authority.

Opinion of Attorney-General.

Unneutral use of British ship by charterer, the subject of a neutral Power, avoids the charter.

IF the Admiralty have good grounds for thinking that Messrs. Walker's ships are being used by their American charterers to supply coal to German cruisers, they will doubtless require Messrs. Walker to resume control of their ships at once, whatever the legal consequences.

But, assuming the fact to be as suspected, Messrs. Walker appear to be entitled to treat the chartering as at an end. For the charter-party almost certainly contains the terms "to be employed on any lawful trade," i.e., lawful for a ship of its flag, and even if it does not, this is implied. A charterer is not entitled to expose the ship to condemnation in our Prize Courts. An intention so to use the ship, as evidenced by past user, is inconsistent with lawful use under the charter, and therefore avoids it forthwith.

[Treasury.]

[November 12, 1914.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

Assignments by enemy creditors to neutrals of debts due from firms in this country.

THE Treasury Solicitor has been requested by the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury to obtain the opinion of the Law Officers upon the questions whether (1) the payment to a Swiss bank of debts due from firms in this country to firms established in enemy countries and purchased by the bank is prohibited by the "Trading with the Enemy Proclamation No. 2," or is otherwise contrary to law, or (2), the payment of such debts may in any event be enforced at law by the assignee bank.

The questions have arisen in the following circumstances:—

In September last the "Bank in Schaffhausen," Switzerland, wrote to a firm in Leicester informing them that they were charged by Messrs. Theodor Groz and Sons (a German firm) for collection of their outstanding credit, amounting to about 1,700 marks. They asked that the equivalent to this sum should be remitted to the Swiss Bankverein for their account and they would afterwards credit Messrs. Theodor Groz and Sons with the proceeds. The British firm replied that they could not comply with the request, firstly because they thought it would be illegal for them to do so, and secondly, that before they could pay third parties anything on account of Messrs. T. Groz and Sons they would require to have the instructions of that firm; and the British firm submitted a copy of the correspondence to the Board of Trade.

It would appear that the Bank in Schaffhausen, whether or not in consequence of this or other similar efforts on their part it is impossible to say, has given up the attempt to collect debts in this country expressly on behalf of German creditors, and has purported to take assignments of such debts from the German creditors, and is now attempting to collect the debts in its own name.

Several firms established in this country have communicated with Government departments in respect of requests received by them from the Bank in Schaffhausen towards the end of October last for the payment of debts so assigned; and the Home Office has recently forwarded to the Treasury a batch of nineteen letters from the same Bank to various British firms, which letters have been stopped by the Censor.

All these letters are in similar terms; and, for the information of the Law Officers, it is proposed to quote one of these letters as showing exactly the course of procedure followed.

In the instance selected the letter from the Bank is dated the 14th October last, and is to the following effect:—

"Messrs. W. Sandys and Co.,
"Leicester,
"England.

"We herewith beg to inform you that, as per enclosed letter, Messrs. Balh, Blickles, and W^{re}, in Tailfingen, who are our clients, have sold to us the amount you owe them (68L 18s. 2d.). We shall, therefore, be obliged by your remitting the amount due to the Crédit Lyonnais, London, for our account.

"Yours truly,
"Bank in Schaffhausen."
[Initials illegible.]

Enclosed with this letter are (a) a statement of account showing the amount of 68L 18s. 2d. due from Messrs. Sandys and Co. to the German firm, and (b) a letter from the German firm, dated the 9th September last, addressed to Messrs. Sandys and Co., to the following effect:—

"I herewith beg to inform you that I have sold all my claims against you, as shown on the enclosed Statement, to the Bank in Schaffhausen, Swiss.
"Please direct this amount to be paid to the above-named bank."

In forwarding these letters to the Treasury, the Home Office remarked that they were doubtful whether an action brought by the Swiss bank for recovery would not succeed, and added that the Secretary of State would suggest the desirability of obtaining the decision of the Law Officers on this point. The Home Office further stated that it seemed to the Secretary of State clearly necessary to prevent payment of debts due to German firms in the way indicated, and in the event of the Law Officers holding that such payment is prohibited, Mr. McKenna thought that a public announcement on the subject would be desirable with a view to making clear the position of British traders in the matter.

The Law Officers may be interested to know that in one of the instances which have been brought to the notice of the authorities the letter from the German creditor announcing the assignment to the Bank in Schaffhausen goes on to add that "private information re business can be made through the Bank of Schaffhausen, Switzerland, or through Mr. Wolmar Horst, Tools and Materials, Copenhagen."

It is submitted that there is grave reason to suspect that the assignments in question are not bonâ fide and absolute assignments, but have merely been entered into as an easy method by which the German firms may perhaps collect debts due to them in this country. If this is so, payment to the bank would seem to be a payment "for the benefit of an enemy," and so prohibited by the express terms of the "Trading with the Enemy Proclamation, No. 2," of the 9th September last (copy herewith*).

Moreover, it would seem to the Treasury Solicitor that the Swiss bank is not entitled legally to enforce payment of the debts so assigned to it. Assignments of debts can only take place, subject to all equities existing as between the assignor and the debtor up to the date of notification of the assignment to the debtor. Here the assignments themselves were presumably some considerable time after the outbreak of hostilities between this country and Germany, the effect of which was to suspend all remedies on the part of German creditors in respect to payment so long as the war lasts, and—under the "Trading with the Enemy Proclamation No. 2"—to make it illegal for the English debtors to remit any payments to the German firms. And so long as the war lasts, payment of interest even on debts otherwise carrying interest is suspended (see "Du Belloix v. Lord Waterpark," 1822, 1 Dowl and R. 16, and "Mayer v. Reed," 1867, 37 Ga. 482).

It would seem clear that an enemy by assignment of a bill of exchange after the commencement of the war cannot give a good title to a neutral, inasmuch as the neutral must take the bill with notice of defect in title of his assignor (see sec. 29 (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, and Schuster, "The Effect of War and Moratorium on Commercial Transactions," 2nd ed., at p. 36.)

It would be strange if the assignee of an ordinary debt were in a more favourable position than the assignee of a negotiable instrument.

The Law Officers are requested to advise the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury generally on the questions discussed in the case.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

The case put is that of a claim against a British debtor by the neutral assignee of a debt which would be due from the British debtor to an enemy assignor if war did not exist. It is clear that the enemy assignor could not, during hostilities, enforce payment of such a debt, and inasmuch as an assignee cannot have better rights than his assignor, it follows that the neutral assignee is in no better position. We, of course, are assuming that the assignment is after war began.

The transfer of rights arising under a negotiable instrument is not necessarily governed by the same rule, for an assignee of a negotiable instrument who is a "bonâ fide holder for value" may in some cases have better rights than his assignor. But this is very doubtful where the assignor's remedy is barred by war, and it is under consideration whether it should not be provided by Statute that negotiable instruments in the hands of a neutral who has acquired them after war from an enemy are not capable of collection during war.

Extradition
Order in Council
(Germany:

vention),
1914.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you herewith a draft Order in Council which has been prepared in consultation with the Home Office, Colonial Office, and the India Office, in order to give effect in the case of Germany to the extradition provisions of the White Slave Traffic Convention of the 4th May, 1910, a copy of which is also enclosed.

I am to request that you will take this draft into your consideration and favour the Secretary of State with your opinion whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

Sir Edward Grey would at the same time be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general nature which you may consider it desirable to offer on the papers now submitted to you.

I have, &c.
RALPH PAGET.

Report.

The terms of the draft Order in Council which we have initialled are, in our opinion, fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

It is a somewhat intricate problem whether the offences with which the Order in Council is intended to deal are within the Extradition Acts: but, inasmuch as "The Extradition Act, 1873," includes among extraditable offences not only any indictable offence under the "Offences against the Person Act, 1861," but any indictable offence under "any Act amending or substituted for the same," we are disposed to agree that the view which we understand has been adopted by those who drafted the Order in Council is correct, viz., that procuration under the statutes of 1885 and 1912 (which take the place of section 49 of the Act of 1861) is one of the crimes within the existing law as to extradition.

Annex.

Draft Order in Council.

WHEREAS by the Extradition Acts, 1870 to 1906, it was amongst other things enacted that, where an arrangement has been made with any foreign State with respect to the surrender to such State of any fugitive criminals, His Majesty may, by Order in Council, direct that the said Acts shall apply in the case of such foreign State; and that His Majesty may, by the same or any subsequent Order, limit the operation of the Order, and restrict the same to fugitive criminals who are in or suspected of being in the part of His Majesty's dominions specified in the Order, and render the operation thereof subject to such conditions, exceptions, and qualifications as may be deemed expedient:

And whereas a Treaty was concluded on the fourteenth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two, between Her late Majesty Queen Victoria and His late Majesty the German Emperor for the mutual extradition of fugitive criminals, in the case of which Treaty the Extradition Act, 1870, was applied by Order in Council of the twenty-fifth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two:

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 24, 1914.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to ask that you will take into your consideration the following questions which have arisen in connexion with the state of relations now prevailing between the United States of America and Mexico, and that you will favour him with your advice with regard to them.

Certain owners of vessels sailing under the British flag have informed the Secretary of State that they have received offers from the United States Government to charter some of their ships, with the option of purchase, for the purpose, it is understood, of transporting troops of the United States to Mexico if the need therefor should arise.

In the cases of such of these vessels as are now outside the limits of His Majesty's dominions and are likely so to continue up to the time of the proposed chartering, Sir E. Grey desires to be advised whether, assuming a state of war to be in existence, an offence against section 8 (4) of "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870" (Annex A), would be committed if the vessels were so chartered, and whether, in the circumstances, it would be the duty of the Secretary of State to warn the shipowners in question that by entering into such charters they would render themselves liable to the penalties provided by that Act. The Secretary of State understands that it is proposed to place American crews on board the vessels; in this case presumably no question of any infraction of the provisions of section 4 of the said Act would arise.

As regards those vessels which are now within His Majesty's dominions, or may come within those dominions before the dates on which their charters were entered into, Sir E. Grey would be glad to be favoured with your opinion whether, acting still upon the assumption that a state of war exists, an offence against section 8 (4) of the Act referred to would arise out of their despatch from His Majesty's dominions with a view to the employment specified above, and whether, in the circumstances, instructions should be issued by the Secretary of State for the detention of the vessels concerned.

I am, in conclusion, to recall to your attention the fact that the provisions of section 8 of the said Act go considerably beyond the international obligations assumed by His Majesty's Government under article 8 of The Hague Convention concerning the rights and duties of neutral Powers in maritime war (Annex B), and to remind you that a Bill which will, if passed, materially limit the scope of that section of the Act is now under consideration.

As urgent enquiries are being received on this subject, the Secretary of State would be very grateful to receive your opinion at your earliest possible convenience.

I have, &c.

RALPH PAGET.

Report.

The question is whether section 8, sub-section (4), of "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870," has any application to cases in which the ship is not within His Majesty's dominions.

We are of opinion that the sub-section, upon its true construction, applies equally wherever the ship is: if a shipowner does any act within His Majesty's dominions which causes his ship to be despatched in the circumstances defined in the sub-section, he commits an offence even though his ship is not in British territory. On the other hand, inasmuch as the prohibitions of section 8 go considerably beyond what international law requires, it cannot be said to be a matter of international obligation to insist upon such prohibition in a case where the duties of a neutral state are not involved.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit to you herewith the draft of an Order in Council, to be entitled "The Muscat Order in Council, 1914," which has been prepared in consultation with the India Office.

The accompanying Order has been drafted to meet the requirements of the present day, as the Muscat Order in Council of 1867 is of an obsolete character and the amendments to The Persian Coast and Islands Order in Council and the introduction of "The Bahrein Order in Council, 1913," render it expedient that the Muscat Order should be brought into line with modern requirements.

I am to request that you will take the draft Order into your consideration and favour Sir Edward Grey at your early convenience with your opinion whether it may fitly and properly be submitted to His Majesty in Council for His Majesty's approval.

We observe that Article 21 (1) of this draft Order contains extensive provisions for deportation without trial; that these provisions do not include any right on the part of the prisoner deported to be heard; and that an appeal against the Order is expressly excluded. We apprehend that we are not called upon to express any opinion as to the expediency of these provisions, and therefore confine ourselves to the question of their efficacy. We are of opinion that their form is apt for the purpose they are designed to secure.

[NOTE.—The text of the Order in Council, dated the 3rd February, 1915, will be found in the "London Gazette" of the 12th February, 1915 (Confidential, No. 10592*).

The text of Article 21, to the first paragraph of which the Law Officers refer in their Report, is as follows:—

"21.—(1.) Where it is shown by evidence on oath, to the satisfaction of the District Court, that any British subject has committed, or is about to commit, an offence against this Order, or is otherwise conducting himself so as to be dangerous to peace and good order, or is endeavouring to excite enmity between the people of Muscat and His Majesty, or is intriguing within the limits of this Order against His Majesty's power and authority, the Court may, if it thinks fit, by order under its seal, prohibit that person from being within the limits of this Order, during any time therein specified, not exceeding two years.

"(2.) The Court, by order in writing under its seal, may vary any order of prohibition (not extending the duration thereof), and may revoke any order of prohibition or removal.

"(3.) The Court shall forthwith report the order and the grounds thereof to the Chief Court, which shall forthwith report to the Governor-General of India in Council every order made under this Article, and the grounds thereof, and the proceedings thereunder."

This Article is identical with, and is founded upon, a similar Article (No. 21) in "The Bahrein Order in Council, 1913," of which the draft was submitted to and

ANNEX.

Draft Persian Coast and Islands (Slave Trade Jurisdiction) Order in Council, 1914.

WHEREAS by Treaty, grant, usage, sufferance, and other lawful means, His Majesty the King has jurisdiction in that portion of the coast and islands of the Persian Gulf and Gulf of Oman which is within the dominions of His Majesty the Shah of Persia;

And whereas by an Order in Council made on the 7th day of May, 1907, and cited as "The Persian Coast and Islands Order in Council, 1907," provision was made for the exercise of such jurisdiction by a Court held by the person for the time being holding the office of His Majesty's Consul-General for Fars and the coasts and islands of the Persian Gulf, and of Political Resident in the Persian Gulf, or by the Judicial Assistant;

And whereas by an Act passed in the 37th year of the reign of Her late Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled "The Slave Trade (East African Courts) Act, 1873," it was, amongst other things, provided that—

"Where any Treaty in relation to the Slave Trade is made after the passing of this Act, by or on behalf of Her Majesty, with any foreign State in Arabia, or on the "East Coast of Africa, or on the shores of the Persian Gulf, or in any island lying off Arabia or off such coast or shores, including the islands of Zanzibar and Madagascar, and the Comoro Islands, Her Majesty may, by Order in Council, direct that as from such date, not being earlier than the date of the Treaty, as may be specified in the Order, such Treaty shall be deemed, and thereupon (as from the said date, or if no date is specified, as from the date of such Order) such Treaty shall be deemed to be an existing East African Slave Trade Treaty within the meaning of this Act, and the provisions of this Act shall apply and be construed accordingly."

And it was further provided that—

"Her Majesty may by such Order, or any subsequent Order referring to the same Treaty, direct that any Court, Consul, or person authorised by or in pursuance of an Order in Council to exercise within the dominions of the foreign State with whom the Treaty is made jurisdiction in matters relating to the Slave Trade shall, subject to the conditions, exceptions, and limitations, if any, contained in the Order, exercise all the jurisdiction conferred by this Act on the East African Courts; and such Court, Consul, or person, when exercising such jurisdiction, shall be deemed to be one of the East African Courts within the meaning of this Act;"

And whereas on the 2nd day of March, 1882, a Treaty or Convention was concluded between Her late Majesty and His Majesty the Shah of Persia for the suppression of the Slave Trade, in the following terms, that is to say:—

"In the Name of God, the Almighty, all Merciful.

"Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, and His Majesty the Shah of Persia, being mutually animated by a sincere desire to co-operate for the extinction of the barbarous Traffic in Slaves, have resolved to conclude a Convention for the purpose of attaining this object, and have named as their Plenipotentiaries, that is to say:—

"Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, Ronald Ferguson Thomson, Esquire, Her Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Persia;

"And His Majesty the Shah of Persia, his Excellency Mirza Saeed Khan, his Minister for Foreign Affairs;

"Who, after having communicated to each other their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon and concluded the following Articles:—

"ARTICLE I.

"In order to prevent the chance of negro slaves, male and female, being imported into Persia, British cruisers shall be permitted to visit and detain merchant-vessels under the Persian flag, or belonging to Persian subjects, which may be engaged in, or which there may be reasonable grounds for suspecting to be or to have been engaged during the voyage on which they are met, in carrying slaves; and if any such slaves are found on board such merchant-vessels, the vessel, with all on board, shall be taken before the nearest Persian authorities for trial. But no person whatsoever who, being furnished with a Government passport, countersigned by a British resident or consul, may have gone from Persia to visit the places of pilgrimage shall, when returning, be interfered with, provided such person be not accompanied by more negroes, either male or female, than the number mentioned in his original pass. The presence of any such additional negro or negroes shall be prima facie evidence of an attempted Traffic in Slaves.

"ARTICLE II.

"If any merchant-vessel under the Persian flag be captured by a British cruiser and taken into a Persian port for adjudication, it shall be the officer of the British cruiser making the capture, or some duly authorized officer of the British Government who shall be present at such adjudication.

"In the event of the captured merchant-vessel being condemned and sold the proceeds of such sale shall go to the Persian Government, and all slaves found on board such vessel shall be handed over to the British authorities.

"ARTICLE III.

"His Majesty the Shah of Persia agrees to punish severely all Persian subjects or foreigners amenable to Persian jurisdiction who may be found engaging in Slave Traffic by sea, and to manumit and guarantee the safety and proper treatment of all slaves illegally imported, that is to say, imported by sea into His Majesty's dominions after the signature of the present Convention.

"ARTICLE IV.

"The present Convention shall come into operation on the first of May, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two. After the Convention shall so have been brought into operation Article XIII of the Treaty between Great Britain and Persia, signed at Paris on the fourth of March, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, by which the agreement entered into by Great Britain and Persia in August, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-one, was renewed, shall be considered as cancelled except as to any proceeding that may have already been taken or commenced in virtue thereof.

"ARTICLE V.

"The ratifications of the present Convention shall be exchanged at Tehran within five months or sooner, if practicable.

"Done at Tehran in quadruplicate, this second day of the month of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two.

"(L.S.) RONALD F. THOMSON.

Now, therefore, His Majesty, by virtue and in exercise of the powers in this behalf as aforesaid, and by virtue and in exercise of the powers in this behalf by "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," or otherwise, in His Majesty vested, is pleased, by and with the advice of His Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, as follows:—

1. The said Treaty or Convention hereinbefore recited shall, from the 1st day of August, 1914, be deemed to be an existing East African Slave Trade Treaty within the meaning of "The Slave Trade (East African Courts) Act, 1873."

2. Subject to the provisions of this Order, it shall be lawful for the Court established under "The Persian Coast and Islands Order in Council, 1907," to exercise jurisdiction in matters relating to the Slave Trade.

3. Subject to the provisions of this Order, the Court established under "The Persian Coast and Islands Order in Council, 1907," shall exercise all the jurisdiction conferred by "The Slave Trade (East African Courts) Act, 1873," on the East African Courts, and the said Court, when exercising such jurisdiction, shall be deemed to be one of the East African Courts within the meaning of the said Act.

4. This Order shall be published in the "Gazette of India" within such time after the passing thereof as the Secretary of State may prescribe, and shall come into force on the 1st day of August, 1914.

5. This Order may be cited as "The Persian Coast and Islands (Slave Trade Jurisdiction) Order in Council, 1914," and shall be read as one with "The Persian Coast and Islands Order in Council, 1907."

And the Most Honourable the Marquess of Crewe, K.G., and the Right Honourable Sir Edward Grey, Baronet, K.G., two of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, are to give the necessary directions herein as to them may respectively appertain.

Annex.

Draft Order in Council providing for the Exercise of British Consular Jurisdiction under the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894 to 1914, in the State of North Borneo.

WHEREAS by section 737 of the "Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," it is provided that where, under that Act, anything is authorised to be done by, to, or before a British consular officer, and in any place outside His Majesty's dominions in which His Majesty has jurisdiction there is no such officer, such thing may be done in that place by, to, or before such officer as His Majesty in Council may direct;

And whereas the "Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," has been amended by the following Acts, namely, the "Merchant Shipping Act, 1897," the "Merchant Shipping (Exemption from Pilotage) Act, 1897," the "Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners) Act, 1898," the "Merchant Shipping (Mercantile Marine Fund) Act, 1898," the "Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and others) Act, 1900," the "Merchant Shipping Act, 1906," the "Merchant Shipping Act, 1907,"* the "Merchant Shipping (Certificates) Act, 1914," and the "Merchant Shipping (Conventions) Act, 1914," which Acts are to be construed as one with the "Merchant Shipping Act, 1894";

And whereas the "Merchant Shipping (Seamen's Allotment) Act, 1911," was passed to remove doubts as to the true interpretation of section 142 of the "Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," and section 62 of the "Merchant Shipping Act, 1906";

And whereas all the before-mentioned Acts, together with any Act amending the same, are hereinafter referred to as the Merchant Shipping Acts;

And whereas the State of North Borneo is a place outside His Majesty's dominions in which His Majesty has jurisdiction, but in which there is no consular officer;

And whereas it has been made to appear to His Majesty that it is expedient that the officer hereinafter named should exercise and perform in the said State the powers and duties of a British consular officer under the Merchant Shipping Acts;

Now, therefore, His Majesty in Council, by virtue of the power vested in him by section 737 of the "Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," is pleased to direct that anything which is, under the Merchant Shipping Acts, authorised to be done by, to, or before a British consular officer may be done in the State of North Borneo by, to, or before the officer for the time being acting as District Officer, Tawao, North Borneo.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen.

Foreign Office, August 21, 1915.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you herewith a draft of an Order in Council (Paper A) to be entitled "The China (Companies) Order in Council, 1915."

The object of the Order is, on the one hand, to provide for the registration at Shanghai of Companies incorporated under the law of Hong Kong and for the exercise of jurisdiction over such Companies by His Majesty's Court in China; and, on the other hand, to supply more effective means of controlling the operations of British Companies in China than those already existing.

The history of this question is fully explained in the two memoranda (Papers B and C) which are enclosed herewith.

I am to explain that it is probable that the passing of the draft Order in Council would have been postponed until after the war were it not for the fact that its provisions are considered by His Majesty's Consular Officers in China to be urgently required in connection with the new regulations prohibiting trading with enemy subjects in that country.

The necessary legislation to be passed in Hong Kong is already drafted, and it is proposed to pass it as nearly as possible simultaneously with the Order in Council.

I am, therefore, to request that you will take the draft Order into your consideration, and that you will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

It is desirable that the Order should be passed with as little delay as possible, and Sir E. Grey would accordingly be grateful if he could be favoured with an expression of your opinion at your early convenience.

I have, &c.

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

Herewith are sent : copy correspondence and memoranda.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs desires the advice of the Law Officers upon the following facts:—

French Government's purchase of Army Boots in England. Charges against Messrs. Cassell and Beaman: Treasury Solicitor should not act for French Government.

Mr. Penton is the official adviser to the French delegates on the Commission internationale de Ravitaillement in connection with the purchase in England of 2,000,000 pairs of army boots. Mr. Ernest Debenham, of Messrs. Debenham and Freebody, boot manufacturers, has stated that a Mr. Cassell and a Mr. Beaman called upon him, and Mr. Cassell stated that they were in a position to control large contracts with the French Government, and suggested that he (Mr. Cassell) should be authorised to obtain orders for Messrs. Debenham and Freebody, the procedure being that he (Mr. Cassell) should be given a commission note, his own commission being about 5 per cent., and that the goods should be invoiced to the French Government at a price which would include his commission and also a commission to the French Government representative. He added that, no matter how reasonable the price quoted, no order would be placed by the representative of the French Government unless a large commission for himself (the representative), or himself and his colleagues, was included. Further, by way of a specific instance, he stated that 1,000,000 pairs of boots had been delivered by a manufacturer in England at 10s. 9d. per pair plus Mr. Penton's 1 per cent., and charged to the French Government at 18 fr. per pair. Mr. Cassell appears to have added that this was the only way business could be done.

These statements were reported by Mr. Debenham to the Commission and came to the knowledge of Mr. Penton, who desires to take proceedings against Messrs. Cassell and Beaman for slander. The French Ambassador feels that some intervention or other steps may become necessary on the part of the French Government or the French members of the Commission in view of the general nature and serious character of the allegations made, and the French Ambassador has consulted the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs as to the course to be adopted in the circumstances, and the Ambassador being unable to consult his legal adviser, who is at the front, has suggested that he should be authorised to consult the Treasury Solicitor. It has not been thought necessary to furnish the Law Officers with copies of the forms of contract or inspection note referred to in the memorandum of the facts sent herewith, as the merits of the case are not now under consideration: but as the Law Officers will see from the correspondence between the Treasury Solicitor and Mr. Tilley of the Foreign Office the question is whether in the circumstances it is advisable that the Treasury Solicitor should be instructed to advise and act for the French Government in the matter, or whether it should be referred to a private solicitor: and the opinion of the Law Officers is desired as to the answer which should be made to the French Ambassador.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

We do not think that the Treasury Solicitor should act for the French Government herein. Any action would have to be brought by some individual person who should be represented by a private solicitor. The French Government would have no locus standi.

[Oversea Prize Disposal Committee.]

[File 993/15.]

Memorandum as to proposed Utilization of detained Enemy Ships in Trade, with the Opinion of the Attorney-General annexed.

THE Oversea Prize Disposal Committee, in view of the great scarcity of tonnage, has recommended the utilization of the enemy ships which have been sentenced to detention during the war, in accordance with Articles 2 or 3 of The Hague Convention No. VI. The view of the effect of those articles which has so far been adopted is that, provided the ships are returned to their owners at the end of the war in reasonably good condition, the owners are not concerned with what is done with them during the war, and have no claim for any money which they may earn in the course of it. The Foreign Office have recently proposed that these ships should be insured and that ship-keepers should be provided, it being hoped that the cost of these measures can be recovered from the enemy Government as part of the terms of peace.

The method proposed for making use of these ships is that they should be requisitioned by the Admiralty under Order 29, Rule 4 (a) or 4 (b), and should then be chartered to British shipowners on time charter. It will be also necessary for them to be given a British register as Government ships under section 80 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1906," and the Order in Council of the 22nd March, 1911. It is conceived that this procedure is in harmony with the provisions of the Convention No. VI above referred to, and that no difficulty will arise in restoring the ship to the owner at the end of the war in lieu of paying him her value.

The question on which it is desired to obtain the opinion of the Attorney-General is whether it would be safe to allow ships which have been dealt with in this manner to enter a neutral port. It appears that there are two possible risks:—

1. An attempt might be made by the original owners to claim these ships as their property by action in the local Courts.
2. A neutral Government might conceivably claim to regard them as public ships and to submit them to such disabilities as, for instance, the twenty-four hours' rule.

As to 1, it is conceived that any Court would recognize the transfer of title which has been effected in the manner above described, but there may be some possibility of a vexatious delay being caused by proceedings in the Court of a neutral.

As to 2, it may be worth while to mention that in the case of the "Schneefels," a German ship which has been condemned, but which is being allowed to complete her voyage to the United States before sale, and discharge her cargo there, His Majesty's Government have intimated semi-officially to the United States' Government that they do not expect this ship to be treated as a public ship. In this case it was, however, arranged that the ship should be registered in the name of an individual. The Committee would be very grateful if the Attorney-General would indicate whether, in his opinion, either of the above risks is sufficiently serious to render it necessary that a stipulation should be made when chartering these vessels that they should only trade with ports in the British Empire or with allied countries. They would also be glad to know whether, in the opinion of the Attorney-General, there is in this connection any difference between the position of a ship which has been permanently requisitioned under Order 29, Rule 1 or 4 (a), and of one which has been temporarily requisitioned under Order 29, Rule 4 (b); and, further, whether the position is affected if an undertaking in writing is given to the Court instead of the appraised value of the ship being paid into Court, under Order 29, Rule 4 (a); and in view of the case of the "Schneefels," which has been mentioned above, they would be grateful to be informed whether there is any

G difference in this connection in the position of a ship which has been registered under the Order in Council of 1911 as a Government ship and that of one which has been registered in the name of an individual.

Opinion of the Attorney-General.

I have had the advantage of talking these points over with Mr. Malkin. I deal with them seriatim as lettered in the margin:—

A. If the Admiralty requisitions (i.e., permanently requisitions) an enemy merchantman, the ship becomes a "Government ship" within section 80 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1906," and can be registered accordingly. If the ship is within Article 2 of Convention VI, the late owner would be entitled (in the absence of arrangement to retransfer) to money compensation in lieu of the ship.

B. After such a requisition, a foreign Court ought to recognize the Government title, and if the ship's papers are in due order would, I think, do so.

C. It seems to me that such a vessel when engaged in commerce is not a "public ship" in the relevant sense, for the twenty-four hours' rule really applies to vessels (whether actually owned by the Government or not) acting with or forming part of naval forces.

D. I therefore think these risks are not so serious as to require this limitation to be insisted on, though, of course, some risk of raising litigations or diplomatic questions would be run. However, if the neutral Court or Government takes the right view, I think the result would be in our favour.

E. "Temporary" requisition certainly raises more difficulty, for it would be impossible to insist that the title had finally and irrevocably passed. Still, the ship, while so requisitioned, would presumably be capable of registration as a British Government ship. But it would be prudent to avoid "temporary" requisition in the case of ships visiting neutral ports.

F. I do not see any real difference between the position when payment has been deposited and when an undertaking satisfactory to the Prize Court is given. The title passes by requisition, not by deposit of payment.

G. I see no real difference, but since the ship's papers would in the latter case show an individual as owner, it might make the position clearer for a neutral tribunal if the Government which requisitions is registered as owner.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, February 19, 1915.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to enclose, for your consideration, copies of four notes from the Swiss Minister (Papers (A), (B), (C), and (D)), and a Memorandum from the Italian Ambassador (Paper (E)), relative to the opening in Singapore of letters from Switzerland and Italy in transit, through the local British postal administration, to destinations in neutral territory.

It will be seen that M. Carlin and the Marquis Imperiali question the right of His Majesty's Government to submit to censorship correspondence in transit from and addressed to neutral countries, basing their contention on the Universal Postal Convention, 1906, Article 4, sub-section (1), which provides that "The right of transit is guaranteed throughout the entire territory of the Union." The Italian Ambassador also cites Article 1 of The Hague Convention No. 11, 1907, which declares that, with certain irrelevant exceptions, "The postal correspondence of neutrals or belligerents, whatever its official or private character, found at sea on board a neutral or enemy ship is inviolable."

The question of the rights of censorship possessed by His Majesty's Government, in the circumstances already described, forms the subject matter of a note from the Director of Military Operations (Paper (F)) and of a letter from the Secretary of the War Office (Paper (G)), copies of which are enclosed herewith. You will observe that the Director of Military Operations proposes to submit to censorship neutral correspondence from America of the kind which the Swiss Minister and the Italian Ambassador consider to be immune from interference under the provisions of international Agreements ratified by His Majesty's Government, and that the letter from Sir R. Brade (Paper (G)) contests the meaning placed upon the Article of the Universal Postal Convention cited by the Swiss Minister, and quotes Articles 2 and 16 of the same Convention in support of the views held by the Army Council.

Censorship of letters passing through British territory from one neutral country to another.

A similar question arose during the Boer War. In pursuance of the Martial Law Regulations which were in force in Cape Colony, the military authorities were in the habit of opening correspondence in transit to German South-West Africa. The German Government objected to the practice, and the question whether it was consistent with the Postal Convention then in force was submitted to the Law Officers. Copies of the note received from the German Ambassador on the 5th March, 1902 (Paper (H)), and a note submitted by the Dutch Minister on the 18th March, 1902 (Paper (I)), which were submitted to the Law Officers, are enclosed herewith. Your predecessors reported on the 31st March, 1902, that letters transmitted under the Convention were liable to examination in the same way as other letters, and that the provisions of the Convention must be regarded as applicable to a state of peace. A copy of the opinion is enclosed for convenience of reference (Paper (J)).

Since that date the Postal Convention of 1906 has replaced the previous Convention, but the provisions relating to this question have not undergone material change.

In view of the opinions now expressed by the Italian Ambassador and the Swiss Minister, and the importance of the principle at stake, Sir E. Grey would be glad if you will take the enclosed papers into consideration and favour him with your opinion whether His Majesty's Government possess the right to submit to censorship correspondence passing in transit between neutral countries through British postal administrations.

Sir E. Grey would also be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

Report.

WE are of opinion that His Majesty's Government is justified in censoring letters which in the course of transit from one neutral country to another passed through British territory. We agree with the view expressed by our predecessors on the 31st March, 1902, when reporting on a similar question. It is obvious that a state of war suspends the application of Article 4 (1) of the Universal Postal Convention as between the belligerents themselves, and this shows that it is one of those Agreements which are only intended to operate in their entirety during a state of peace. It would indeed be a ridiculous construction of the Convention to suppose that it bound a belligerent State to make itself the conduit-pipe for communications intended to defeat its own measures of war.

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

Power of the Crown to make grants out of Prize Funds.

AS the Law Officers will observe from the copy minutes herewith,* the question has arisen as to the power of the Crown to make grants out of prize proceeds to meet claims recommended for payment by the Prize Claims Committee, or payments to officers and men of the naval service by way of bounty in lieu of prize money along the lines announced, namely, not as rewards to the actual captors, but as a general bounty to be distributed rateably throughout the service.

The Law Officers are requested to refer generally to the copy minutes and, in particular, to the argument contained in the minute of the solicitor to the Treasury, dated the 26th February, 1915 (see page 4 et seq.), which the remarks in this case are intended to some extent to supplement.

It seems that all prize is to be regarded as constituting either droits of the Crown or droits of Admiralty. Such droits of the Crown are in the main those which in former wars have almost without exception been granted to the actual captors by proclamation issued after the declaration of war. The droits of Admiralty constituted the perquisites of the Lord High Admiral, and, since that office has fallen into abeyance, have passed to the Crown in right of the office of Admiralty. No general grant of these rights has ever been made similar to that of droits of the Crown, but it appears to have been the practice of the Crown, out of its bounty, to make grants of a varying proportion of the proceeds of these droits of Admiralty to persons who had been in any way material in securing the property to the Crown, and in the case of the "Belvidere" (1 Dods. 353; 2 E.P.C. 183) Lord Stowell referred to a practice to give to English merchants from the bounty of the Crown the expenses incurred in the outfit of a vessel immediately before seizure. At that time droits of the Crown and droits of the Admiralty formed part of the hereditary revenue passing to the Crown, to be dealt with by the Crown without any material restriction in this respect, but, at any rate, by the Act of 1 Vic., cap. 2, these hereditary revenues were surrendered by the Sovereign, and were to be carried to the Consolidated Fund, and as pointed out in the Solicitor's minute referred to, under section 12, there was reserved to the Crown only the power to grant any droits of Admiralty or droits of the Crown or part or proportion of such droits respectively as a reward or remuneration to any officer or officers or other person or persons seizing or taking the same or giving any information relating thereto.

Although not perhaps as clear as might be, it would seem that the subsequent Civil List Acts of 1 Edward VII, cap. 4 (sections 1 and 9 (2)), and 10 Edward VII and 1 George V, cap. 28 (sections 1 and 9 (2)), have left the position in this respect the same.

During the Crimean War the only grants that were made of prize proceeds were the usual grant to captors of droits of the Crown, and certain limited grants out of the droits of Admiralty to those who had been instrumental in seizing the property, or had given information resulting in the seizure. These cases, therefore, fell expressly within section 12 of the Civil List Act, 1837.

The payments which it is now suggested should be made out of prize proceeds would not appear to fall within the express wording of this section. Payments to mortgagees or necessary men, and payments by way of bounty to the whole of the personnel of the navy can scarcely be regarded as rewards to persons seizing or taking the property or giving information in relation thereto, and the question arises whether prize proceeds to meet such payments can be held back, or whether the proceeds must not pass to the Consolidated Fund pursuant to the Civil List Acts, in which case apparently money to meet the proposed payments will as matters stand have to be voted by Parliament.

Moreover, as regards at any rate the "detained" ships there may be no funds arising from any particular vessel from which claims could be met. These ships were all seized under circumstances in which, if condemned, they would have been "droits of Admiralty"; presumably, therefore, the lesser rights now existing in such vessels are also "droits of Admiralty," and any profits realised from the user of such of these vessels as have been requisitioned also constitute such droits.

* Not printed.

Special grants out of droits of Admiralty or droits of the Crown were, at the time of the Napoleonic wars, effected by means of a warrant to the Registrar of the Admiralty Court signed by three of the Lords of the Treasury and under the Royal Sign Manual, on which an order of the Court was made for payment out to the grantee. A similar procedure was followed after the Crimean War, except that only two Lords signed the warrant (see 12 & 13 Vic., cap. 89).

The Law Officers are requested to advise the Treasury generally on the questions discussed in the minutes and in this case.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

1. We think that (a) enemy ships captured by the commissioned vessels of the Crown or driven in by them are droits of the Crown; (b) enemy ships captured in harbour, &c., by other means are droits of Admiralty.

2. The old practice was to treat these droits on an entirely separate footing. Droits of Admiralty were dealt with by the Treasury. The proceeds, subject to rewards to the captors in the nature of salvage, belonged to the King in his office of Admiralty. Droits of the Crown, so far as concerns naval prize, were dealt with by the Admiralty, and the proceeds distributed as prize money.

3. Since 1830, when these rights were surrendered by William IV (1 Will. IV, cap. 25) the rights of the Crown have been limited to those set out in section 12 of that Act, which we think is still in force, having regard to section 12 of the statute 1 Vic., cap. 2, and section 9 (2) of the statutes 1 Edw. VII, cap. 4, and 1 Geo. V, cap. 28.

4. It follows, therefore, that Parliamentary sanction is necessary for any application of the proceeds of such droits which is not warranted by the old practice.

5. We think it is doubtful whether the Crown has a right to distribute the proceeds of naval prize among the officers and crews of the Royal Navy generally, and if the old practice is departed from we think the distribution should be regulated by Act of Parliament.

6. We think that the proceeds of neither of these droits are available, without Parliamentary sanction, to make any ex gratia payments, e.g., claims recommended for consideration by the Prize Committee.

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

A TELEGRAM was sent to the Colonial Secretary on the 28th November by the Governor of Hong Kong asking whether any decision had been arrived at as to whether the Prize Court could give costs and damages against the Crown; if not, the sender would be glad to learn the opinion of the Law Officers. The telegram ends: "Telegraph reply with least possible delay.—MAY."

Mr. Secretary Harcourt replied, after consulting the Procurator-General, as follows:—

"Ordinary rule applies prize cases. Crown neither pays nor receives costs. Damages cannot be ordered against Crown, since they could only be awarded in respect of tortious acts.—HARCOURT."

The Procurator-General agreed to this telegram as representing what apparently is the state of the law at this moment. In view, however, of the fact that there has been no judicial decision in regard to the general question, he did not think that the point could be regarded as free from doubt. It is desired now that the Law Officers should consider the question primarily in order that their opinion may be sent to Hong Kong for the guidance of the Governor.

With regard to this difficult question it is unnecessary for the writer of this to cite cases or to discuss them, for a full citation, with comments, will be found in Robertson, p. 613 and following. The matter is also dealt with fully in its relation to the Prize Court by Mr. Bentwich in the opinion which accompanies these papers. The matter is not carried any further by the "Miramichi" judgment, except in so far as there was a public assertion by the Attorney-General of the general principle. The President, however, left the matter undecided, merely saying that, if he had power to award costs against the Crown, this was a case in which he should not do so. It would seem that the only difficulty arises from the Prize Court Rules, Order XVIII, Rule 1 of which says that the costs of and incident to all prize proceedings shall, except when otherwise provided by any agreement or by statute, be in the discretion of the Judge. These words are, however, general, and it will be for the Law Officers to consider what their effect is. The Prize Court Rules have statutory authority—see on this section 3 of "The Prize Court Act, 1894," which provides that Her Majesty the Queen in Council may make Rules of Court, and that every Rule so made shall take effect at the time therein mentioned. This would invest the Rules with statutory power, for all the conditions were no doubt fulfilled, they having been authorised by the King in Council on the 5th August, 1914, and the other formalities necessary no doubt complied with.

Will the Law Officers please advise as to what is the position of the Crown in prize cases with regard to costs.

Herewith are sent:—

Damages and Costs against the Crown in Prize Cases.

Previously to the Statute 18 & 19 Vict., cap. 90 (Crown Suits Act), the Common Law Courts had no power to condemn the Crown in costs. Under that Statute it has been held that the Crown is only liable to pay costs in suits in which the Attorney-General or the Lord Advocate are parties, and not when the suit is by the King in his office of Admiralty (The Leda, 32 L.J., Adm., p. 58). In that case, however, Dr. Lushington pointed out that there was a conflict of authority on the point, the Privy Council having awarded costs against the Crown in an ecclesiastical appeal (Dyke v. Barton, 10 Moo. P.C., 458) where the Crown, through the Procurator-General, had made an unsuccessful appeal against a decision of the Prerogative Court, while the Court of Queen's Bench, in Reg. v. Beadle (7 E. and B., 492), had held reluctantly that the Statute authorised costs to be given against the Crown only where the party to the action was the Attorney-General or the Lord Advocate. In the later case of Atkinson v. Queen's Proctor (L.R., 2 P. and M., 255) it was held that there was no jurisdiction to condemn the Queen's Proctor in the costs of unsuccessful litigation in a probate suit, and this decision may be taken to overrule Dyke v. Barton. It may be noted here that when the King's Proctor makes an unsuccessful intervention in a divorce suit he may be ordered to pay costs (Carter v. Carter, 1910, p. 51); but the King's Proctor intervenes on behalf of the public and not of the Crown, and a special Statute authorises an order for costs against him. In the case of The Gauntlet (L.R., 4 P.C., 185) it was left uncertain by the Court of Appeal whether costs could be awarded against the Crown in the case of an unsuccessful suit following an unjustifiable seizure of a vessel under "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870." The Judge of the Admiralty Court (Sir R. Phillimore) had condemned the Crown in costs on deciding that the seizure was not justified, but the question of costs was not apparently argued before him (L.R., 3 A. and E., 381, at p. 394). The question cannot be considered to be definitely settled; and in the most recent case where the right to give costs against the Crown was considered (Rex v. Johnson, L.R. 1904, A.C., 810) the Privy Council laid down that in exceptional cases they could mulct the Crown in costs. In the absence of special circumstances, however, showing unreasonable action on the part of the Crown, it is probable that costs would not be awarded in a Prize Court against its representatives. On the other hand, it is clear that costs may be awarded in a Prize Court against the officer of a public ship who has, without sufficient cause, brought in a neutral vessel as prize (see The Ostsee, 2 E.P.C., 432, at pp. 451, 454; The Leucade, ibid., 473; The Mentor,

* Copy of judgment is kept in Foreign Office Library (Confidential, No. 10566*).

1 E.P.C., 96). And in the case of The Leda Dr. Lushington pointed out that costs were given by him in the Admiralty Court against an officer of a public ship who was responsible for a collision (The Swallow, Sw., 30).

It was suggested, however, in The Leucade, at p. 476, that the Prize Court would not award costs against captors except with damages for wrongful seizure; and it may be therefore that in any interlocutory proceeding costs would not be awarded against captors, but would be reserved till the decision on the principal question, when they would be added to the damages by way of restitution.

Where the Crown appears in the Prize Court to apply for condemnation of enemy or neutral property and restitution is ordered, it is submitted that the Crown cannot be directed to pay costs to the successful claimants, even if the seizure is held to have been unjustifiable; but the claimants would be entitled in the Prize Court to apply for the joinder in the action of the actual captors so as to obtain a decree against them. The Crown would doubtless indemnify the captors against any such decree. The general principle that the Crown is not liable for the wrongful acts of its public officers would be applicable to a claim for costs and damages against it (Tobin v. R., 16 C.B., N.S., 310). The fact that there is no reported case of costs and damages being given against the Crown, though not conclusive because of the old practice by which the captors were joined regularly in the suit, is some evidence in favour of the immunity of the Crown; and the analogy of the practice under the Slave Trade Acts, under which a claim for damages for wrongful seizure must be brought against the captor, and not against the Crown by petition of right supports this position (see Robertson, "Civil Proceedings," &c., at p. 520). It appears from Order 5 of the new Prize Court Rules that claimants can obtain an order against the captors for damages and costs where the captors fail to take proceedings in the Prize Court after seizure, or, in other words, where the Crown does not proceed. Although nothing is said explicitly in the Rules, it would seem to follow that where proceedings are taken by the Crown and fail, the claimants would be entitled, as they were under the old practice, to proceed directly against the captors for damages and costs, and it would be no answer for the captors to say that they had not brought the suit against the captured property. The capture was made at their peril, and they were legally liable for the loss caused to the claimants if the property was captured without justification. The Crown may doubtless choose of its grace to pay costs in order to avoid action being taken against the individual captors; but it is submitted that the legal position in prize, as in other Admiralty cases, is that the Crown neither gives nor receives costs (see as to the Crown receiving costs, The Duke of Sussex, 1 W. Rob., 274).

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

In our opinion there is no jurisdiction to award costs in prize cases to or against the Crown.

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers and Mr. R. A. Wright.

S.S. "NOORDAM" and S.S. "ROTTERDAM."

THE following documents are sent herewith:—

1. Minutes of the Contraband Committee.
2. Telegrams passing between the parties.
3. Memorandum from the French War Office.
4. Notes from the Netherlands Oversea Trust.
5. Various Memoranda.
6. Memorandum entitled "Case for Prize Court."
7. Copy of Agreement with the N.O.T.
8. Note by Mr. E. Pollock, K.C.

Two shipments of gold from America to Holland in the above vessels have been under consideration for some time past by the Contraband Committee, namely, 500,000 dollars in gold shipped by Boissevain and Co., New York, to Boissevain and Co., Amsterdam, in the steamship "Rotterdam," and 1,000,000 dollars in gold shipped by Goldman, Sachs, and Co., New York, to the Rotterdamsche Bank Vereeniging, of Amsterdam, on the steamship "Noordam."

In accordance with the policy pursued under the agreement with the N.O.T., these shipments were allowed to go forward to Holland, but the N.O.T. have been requested to return them to this country in order that they may both be placed in the Prize Court.

The N.O.T. have raised certain difficulties against complying with the request of His Majesty's Government, partly based on the contention that there is nothing to justify the suspicion that the gold is destined for Germany, and partly on the ground that such cases are not covered by their agreement with His Majesty's Government.

It is thought desirable, therefore, before insisting upon the return of these shipments, to take the opinion of the Law Officers as to whether, on the facts laid before them, there is a reasonable expectation that proceedings against these two consignments in the Prize Court can be prosecuted to a successful conclusion.

Both the shippers are notorious for their co-operation with German banks and German trade. The telegrams submitted show that they have been engaged in the sufficiently well-known enormous sales in America of American securities for German account.

No gold is known to be shipped direct from America to Germany, and the proceeds, therefore, of the sales of such securities would appear necessarily to be intended either for the payment in America of the large surplus over the normal imports into the neutral countries adjacent to Germany—which are obviously intended to find their way to that country—or for shipment to the neutral countries themselves to pay in those countries for the surplus over the home needs of those countries which finds its way to Germany.

In the absence of any definite information as to the true nature of the transaction, there is another consideration which is of importance. There is no doubt that for some time past Holland has been purchasing from America more than she has been exporting to that country, and as the current of trade is flowing from America to Holland, one would have expected the flow of gold to have been from Holland to America, where the credit for carrying out purchases would be required.

On the other hand, it is probable that Germany is purchasing from Holland more than Holland is purchasing from Germany, and it would therefore be an advantage to Germany to have a credit in Holland available for further purchases of goods. There would, therefore, appear to be no reason why, in the prevailing trade conditions, the deposit of gold should be required in Holland to enable the Dutch to make purchases, whereas there is every reason why such a deposit would be of value to the Germans, who require to make purchases in Holland.

There would appear in this case to be no evidence that the gold was intended to be actually forwarded to Germany, but there is good ground for the contention that it was to be utilised in Holland either for the opening of credit for future sales by Holland to Germany or for the payment of debts incurred by past transactions of this sort.

It is to be observed that gold and silver in coin or bullion have been on the conditional contraband list since the 5th August, 1914, and presumably, therefore, the special destination prescribed by articles 33 and 34 of the Declaration of London has to be proved before condemnation can be secured, subject to this qualification that it is not open to an Enemy Department of State, to whom it may be proved to be destined, to show that the gold, in fact, cannot be used for the purpose of the war in progress. It seems hardly probable that the evidence available will be sufficient to establish the actual destination of the gold in Germany, and the most that the Court can reasonably be asked to infer would seem to be that it was intended to be deposited in Holland for German account, and that the credit resulting from it would be at the disposal of persons in Germany, and possibly the German Government.

Assuming that the Court was prepared to draw this inference, it would still remain a legal question whether a decree of condemnation could be made. It would certainly appear to be a novel extension of the doctrine of contraband to ask the Court to decree condemnation of goods of contraband character upon proof of destination in a neutral country for the benefit of the enemies. So far as is known, there is no case which supports this view.

It may be argued that a result of the present mercantile usage is that the important point with regard to bullion is not the actual destination of the bullion itself, but of the credit which that bullion supports. From this it may follow that, in the same way that a bill of lading may form constructive delivery of the merchandise with which it deals, so possession of credit based on bullion may be construed as possession of the bullion on which the credit is based.

The question is one of extreme difficulty, and it is proposed to ask the Law Officers and Mr. Wright to fix a consultation, when the matter can be discussed in greater detail; and it is hoped that Mr. Pollock, K.C., the chairman of the Contraband Committee, will be able to attend and express his views upon the matter, to which he has given considerable attention.

The Law Officers are requested to advise whether there is sufficient expectation that the condemnation of this gold could be obtained in the Prize Court to justify insisting on the return of the gold in view of the position taken up by the N.O.T.

Joint Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. R. A. Wright.

We think that, though the questions of law and fact involved are not free from doubt and difficulty, there is such a prima facie ground for proceedings in the Prize Court for condemnation of the gold as to justify its seizure.

The question of law involved is whether it is essential in a claim for condemnation of gold as conditional contraband to prove an actual intention that the gold as a physical object should be carried into Germany. Though the point is not precisely covered by authority, we think that it is not necessary. In our opinion it is enough that the gold is consigned to or for an agent of the German Government. The peculiarity of gold is that it can be used by the German Government as a part of its gold reserve and as a basis of credit without ever reaching German territory. (See the note to article 33 in the General Report on the Declaration of London.) We may refer to the American case of the "Commercen" (1 Wheat, 382), in which cargo destined for the British army was condemned though the port of destination was a neutral port.

We may point out that, by reason of the Rhine Convention of the 17th October, 1868, ratified on the 17th April, 1869, it is arguable that Rotterdam, for purposes of contraband questions, is not strictly a neutral port.

On the question of fact—i.e., whether the gold was destined to the agents of and for the use of the German Government—we think that the intercepted cables, the conditions of business actually done, and the arguments adduced in the Contraband Committee's notes and the French memorandum constitute a sufficient prima facie case for initiating proceedings, on the ground that the Dutch banks to which the gold was consigned were in truth agents for the German Government, either directly or through the mediation of the German banks, which are under German Government control and are practically German Government Departments.

It is, of course, impossible for us at this early stage of the evidence (which will require careful and immediate investigation) to say that the above conclusions are certain to be established. We think, however, that the materials before us and the inherent probabilities of the case are such as to justify taking the risks of stopping the gold and putting it into the Prize Court, and we accordingly advise that that course should be adopted.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 14, 1916.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Edward Grey, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list relative to the status of goods which, under arrangements made between His Majesty's Government and certain neutral shipping companies, are stored in the country of destination instead of being returned to this country in order to be made the subject of proceedings in the Prize Court.

The particular case which has brought the question up is that of certain goods ex "Arkansas," as to which the American Ambassador has addressed an enquiry to the Secretary of State (Paper A), but the point raised is one which applies equally to all goods treated in this way, and as it is one of considerable importance, Sir Edward Grey would be glad to receive your views as to the position.

A copy of the Agreement with the United Steamship Company of Copenhagen, under which these goods were dealt with (which Agreement takes the form of the record of a conversation with the Managing Director of the Company), is enclosed herewith (Paper B). You will observe that under it in certain cases goods are allowed to proceed to Denmark on the undertaking of the Company that they will be returned to this country in order that they may be placed in the Prize Court; but it is also provided that in order to avoid the necessity of returning such goods they may, in certain cases, be stored in Denmark until the end of the war, instead of being returned to this country. Agreements of a similar nature have been made with several other shipping companies. The goods ex "Arkansas" were dealt with under the terms of the Agreement with the United Steamship Company, instructions being given that they should either be stored or returned to this country, and it appears that the Shipping Company elected to store rather than return them.

In order to enable the Shipping Company to carry out their obligations under this Agreement, a special clause is inserted in their bills of lading which will be found set out in Paper C. It will be noticed that the provisions of this clause only apply "in case of seizure of the within goods by belligerent nations."

The points which now arise will be found fully described in the minutes, a copy of which is enclosed herewith (Paper C). The important point is whether it is necessary or advisable in these cases that proceedings should be instituted by the Crown in the Prize Court here, in spite of the fact that the goods are stored in the country of destination.

The present enquiry of the United States Ambassador is merely as to the status of goods at present detained in Denmark, but if the facts are explained to his Excellency, a further note will probably be received in due course, in which the propriety of the action of His Majesty's Government will be questioned, and in which it is by no means impossible that a claim for compensation will be put forward on behalf of the shipper of the goods.

It has for some time past been the policy of His Majesty's Government to try and secure that claims for compensation arising out of the exercise of belligerent rights at sea should be dealt with in the Prize Court, and not through the diplomatic channel. If the direction of the Shipping Company to store the goods should be regarded as an exercise of belligerent rights from which a claim for compensation might arise, it would presumably be open to the claimant to initiate proceedings in the Prize Court claiming such compensation irrespective of the locality of the goods detained.

I am therefore to request that you will take the papers enclosed herewith into your consideration, and favour Sir Edward Grey at your earliest convenience with your opinion:—

1. Whether an agreement of the nature described between His Majesty's Government and a shipping company, coupled with a provision in the company's bills of lading enabling them to carry out their obligations under the Agreement, constitute a sufficient answer in cases where the goods are stored in the country of destination, to any representations by a foreign Power that the case ought to be brought before the Prize Court.

2. Whether the institution of prize proceedings in such cases would place His Majesty's Government in a stronger position in the event of claims for compensation being put forward on behalf of the shippers of such goods by any foreign Power.

3. If you are of opinion that prize proceedings should be instituted in these cases, whether it would be possible or desirable to institute proceedings in this country while the goods remain stored in the country of destination.

4. Whether, in that case, it would be necessary to ascertain that any order which the Court might make in respect of such goods could be enforced.

5. Whether any modification (if possible) is desirable in the terms of the clause in the bills of lading at present employed by the United Shipping Company, and if so, what the terms of such amendment should be.

Sir Edward Grey would also be glad to be furnished with any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer upon the papers now submitted to you.

I have, &c.
MAURICE DE BUNSEN.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Note from the American Ambassador, February 16, 1916, with enclosure.
- (B.) Copy of Agreement of May 20, 1915, between His Majesty's Government and the United Shipping Company.
- (C.) Copy of Minutes by the Contraband Committee, Mr. Malkin, Mr. Hurst, Sir Eyre Crowe, and Lord Robert Cecil on Paper 31312.

Report.

1. We answer this question in the affirmative. The Shipping Company, being aware of all the circumstances, preferred the advantages of the Agreement of the 20th May, 1915, to a decision in the Prize Court. They relinquished by their Agreement their right to demand that the goods seized should be brought before the Court (paragraphs 1 and 2). The shippers equally agreed (see the clause stamped upon the bill of lading) that as between themselves and the shipowners the shipowners should be entitled to carry out their Agreement of the 20th May with the British authorities. That is to say, the shippers, equally with the shipowners, waived with full knowledge of the facts whatever right they may have possessed that the goods should be dealt with in Prize. The true view probably is that the goods have been conditionally released in conformity with an agreement to which all concerned assented, and which came into operation upon the happening of the contingency contemplated.

2. No; we do not think that His Majesty's Government are in any event called upon to institute prize proceedings.

3 and 4. Do not arise.

5. No modification in the terms of the clause of the bill of lading is desirable during the pendency of this controversy; but, if and when it is adjusted, we think that the condition should be made applicable not only to cases of actual seizure, but also to cases of threatened seizure of goods.

6. Generally. If the American Government is not satisfied with a reply based upon the considerations suggested in our first answer, the British Government may (should they deem it politic) reply that if the shippers consider that they have any cause of complaint against His Majesty's Government they are at liberty to claim in the Prize Court, and that the Government will grant facilities for the hearing of such a claim.

The institution of such proceedings would admit the jurisdiction in spite of the situation of the goods. But the matter is one of policy rather than of law, and we express no further opinion upon it.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. R. A. Wright.

NEGOTIABLE securities have been declared absolute contraband; The Hague Convention on Land Warfare (No. 4 of 1907) recognises by article 53 that realisable securities if property of the enemy State may be the subject of seizure on land. We therefore think that negotiable securities may in proper cases be the subject of prize and hence may reasonably be treated as coming within the scope of the Reprisals Order of the 11th March, 1915, though it is obviously a question of some doubt and difficulty whether they are within its precise terms.

Registered securities are not negotiable (Colonial Bank v. Eady, 15 A.C., 267), and may stand on a different footing. In any case, however, we think there is reasonable ground for the view that the pieces of paper which constitute or embody the negotiable or registered security may be within the terms "goods" or "commodities" under the Reprisals Order, and may accordingly be seized and detained. The above points are obviously novel, and it is impossible to advise on them with certainty.

What effect the seizure and detention will have on the chose in action as contrasted with the paper is a matter of some doubt and difficulty; but we understand that it is not intended to sell the securities but merely to detain them.

We have considered the list of classes of securities submitted to us, a copy of which is annexed, and are of opinion that in each case there is some prima facie evidence or case of suspicion such as to render it possible to allege that the seizure was not without reasonable and probable cause. Whether any particular securities will be condemned must obviously depend on the facts of the particular case.

Some questions of considerable difficulty will arise on the meaning of the words "enemy origin" in the Reprisals Order; we think it can fairly be contended that securities come within that term if they bear on their face (as by enemy rubber or revenue stamps) proof of enemy ownership since the Reprisals Order was issued. We also think there is good reason to consider that securities which came from

PRIZE LAW.

Germany in order to be shipped for realisation in America and which only passed through Dutch banks on their way to America and for purposes of transit fall within the Reprisals Order, even though the Dutch banker and shipper became the legal owner of the securities.

The above questions are of great importance in view of the probability that the Dutch and other neutral claimants will adduce contracts to establish that they became actual purchasers of the securities and dealt in them as speculators, and not as brokers for German owners.

It will be desirable at as early a date as possible to obtain evidence as to the conditions and extent of the shipment of securities of probable German origin to America, and to compare those conditions and extent with what prevailed in normal and pre-war times.

It is obvious that the various classes in the attached lists involve very varying degrees of suspicion, but while we must point out that the questions connected with the stoppage and detention of securities necessarily involve great difficulties from the view of Prize Court proceedings both of fact and of law, we think that the prima facie evidence set out in the lists may fairly be acted upon in carrying out the policy of stopping and detaining securities.

The banks in the United States of America who are the largest buyers of enemy-owned securities are those who are also the largest buyers of neutral—and for that matter British and French—owned securities, and consignment to such banks therefore raises little or no presumption of enemy origin.

[May 27, 1916.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, April 19, 1916.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Bonar Law to request that you will favour him with your opinion on certain points which have arisen in connection with certain tugs, lighters, and other small craft belonging to persons of enemy nationality and employed by them at the outbreak of war in the territorial waters of various British colonies and protectorates. A list of these vessels is given in the enclosed statement, which must not, however, be taken as complete.

2. So far as Mr. Bonar Law is aware, these vessels are in no case registered as British ships, nor do they fly any flag, and, with the possible exception of some of the vessels at Hong Kong, it would seem that the owners must in all cases be regarded as having their commercial domicile in enemy territory.

3. Mr. Bonar Law is advised that such of these vessels as belong to owners commercially domiciled in enemy territory or to enemy subjects domiciled in China, Siam, or any other country in which their State possesses extra-territorial rights could properly be made the subject of prize proceedings. The question arises, however, whether the vessels must be held entitled to the benefit of The Hague Convention No. VI of 1907. It may with much probability be assumed that they were in all cases actually in British ports at the outbreak of war, and it may also be assumed that for some considerable time after the outbreak of war no steps were taken to prevent them leaving British waters had they wished to do so.

4. If the vessels must be held entitled to the benefit of The Hague Convention No. VI, Mr. Bonar Law is unwilling to cause prize proceedings to be instituted, for the reason that in the cases of all these vessels the local branch of the owning firm or company has been, or is being, liquidated by the local Government under special legislation. Some of the vessels in question have actually been sold in these liquidations, and all could be so sold, the proceeds of the sale being used for the payment of non-enemy creditors of the liquidated firms or, in the case of a surplus of assets, being held by the Government pending the conclusion of hostilities. If these vessels must be held entitled to the benefit of The Hague Convention, Mr. Bonar Law would prefer that prize proceedings should not be instituted against them, but that they should be treated as part of the assets of the local establishments of the owning firms.

5. In this connection I am to enclose, for your information, a copy of an opinion* of Mr. Pearce Higgins on the position of vessels of this kind under The Hague Convention No. VI of 1907.

6. If it is considered that these vessels are liable to condemnation by the Prize Court, the further question arises whether the proceeds of sale of such of them as have in fact already been sold by the liquidators of the enemy firms to which they belonged would be liable to condemnation by the Prize Court.

7. I am, therefore, to request that you will take the accompanying papers into your consideration and advise—

- (1.) Whether in your opinion the vessels now in question are or are not entitled to the benefit of The Hague Convention No. VI of 1907, assuming that they were in all cases found in British ports at the outbreak of war; and
- (2.) Whether your answer to question (1) would be affected, and, if so, in what manner, should it prove to be the case (a) that no steps were taken to prevent these vessels leaving enemy territory for some weeks after the outbreak of war, or (b) that steps were taken to prevent them leaving British territory immediately on the outbreak of war.
- (3.) If your answer to (1) is in the negative, whether, in a case where a vessel which has been sold by the official liquidator of the owning firm or company would have been liable to condemnation by a Prize Court, the proceeds of sale of that vessel are liable to condemnation; and
- (4.) If your answer to (3) is in the affirmative, whether any, and what, action by way of transferring the proceeds of sale to the account of the Marshal of the Prize Court or otherwise would be necessary before prize proceedings could properly be instituted against the proceeds of sale.

I am, &c.
G. GRINDLE.

Report.

1. We do not, on the whole, think that these small craft fall within The Hague Convention No. VI of 1907. The French word "navire," standing alone, would appear to denote a sea-going vessel, and the expression "navire de commerce" used in the Convention is more appropriate to sea-going vessels carrying merchandise from one port to another than to tugs and lighters employed at a particular port.

The English term "merchant ship" is also unsuitable to these small craft. The definition of "ship" in the Merchant Shipping Acts does not appear to us to affect the matter.

3. We are disposed to think that the craft in question were exempt from capture under article 3 of Convention No. XI of 1907 as "small boats employed in local trade." If so, some of them have been properly dealt with as assets of the enemy firm to which they belonged, and neither the proceeds of boats sold nor the boats which remain are liable to condemnation.

2 and 4. Upon the above view these questions do not arise.

[June 29, 1916.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, June 7, 1916.

WITH reference to your report of the 27th May, relative to the status of enemy small craft in the territorial waters of British Colonies and Protectorates, I am directed by Mr. Secretary Bonar Law to say that he would be obliged if you could furnish him with a further exposition of your views with regard to the application to these vessels of Article 3 of Hague Convention No. XI of 1907.

Status of enemy small craft in British territorial waters at the outbreak of war.

2. The Secretary of State had already had occasion to consider this question in connection with a steam launch and three lighters, the property of the Hamburg-Amerika Steamship Company, which were seized in Jamaica on the outbreak of war. He was advised that these vessels, since they belonged to a large shipping company which employed them in connection with its business in the Colony, could not be held to be "exclusivement affectés à des services de petite navigation locale" within the meaning of the Third Article of the Convention; moreover, he was advised that it was doubtful whether that Article of the Convention could be held to apply to vessels employed within the jurisdiction of the capturing belligerent. Further support for these conclusions was derived from the decision of the Prize Court at Zanzibar in the case of the lighter "Simba," a printed report of which is enclosed for your information, and from the Japanese cases of the "Michael" and the "Alexander" to which reference was made by Sir Samuel Evans in his judgment in the case of the sailing vessel "Berlin."

3. Having regard, however, to the views expressed in paragraph 3 of your report under reference, Mr. Bonar Law is now in some doubt how far the conclusions referred to in the preceding paragraph can be regarded as valid, and, if so regarded, how far they are applicable to the various vessels particulars of which were given in the statement enclosed in the letter from this Department of the 19th April. In this connection I am to inform you that, of the firms referred to in the said statement, all except the Woermann Linie and the Hamburg-Amerika Linie (which are, of course, large shipping companies) are mercantile firms of varying importance carrying on import and export businesses from the territory in which they are established. Mr. Bonar Law assumes that the lighters alleged to belong to these mercantile firms were used by them for loading and unloading from ocean steamers cargoes in which they were interested, and that the various launches and other small craft owned by them were employed directly or indirectly in the same service.

4. Mr. Bonar Law would be obliged if you would take the preceding paragraphs of this letter into consideration, and would advise him (a) whether, assuming the facts to be as stated in paragraph 3 and in the enclosure to the Colonial Office letter of the 19th April, you consider that any and which of the vessels referred to in the last-mentioned document must be regarded as exempt from capture under Article 3 of Hague Convention No. XI of 1907; and (b) generally as to the principles to be applied in the interpretation of the said Article.

I am, &c.
G. GRINDLE.

Report.

We have reconsidered our answer to question 3 in the reference of the 19th April, 1916.

There is no doubt a good deal to be said for the view that Article 3 of Convention XI of 1907 is confined to vessels engaged in small coastal voyages, and that tugs, lighters, &c., which are used in connection with ocean-going vessels, are neither within the protection of that Article nor entitled to the exemption which is given in practice to enemy property on land. Accordingly, while the question is not free from doubt, we think (on further reflection) that such of these vessels as belong to owners commercially domiciled in enemy territory may be made the subject of prize proceedings with a reasonable prospect of success.

The above conclusion seems to apply to all the vessels mentioned in the statement enclosed in the letter of the 19th April, 1916, though some of them may not be worth seizing as prize. The conclusion, however, does not apply to the proceeds of sale of vessels which have been sold by liquidators. The right of capture may be waived, and if a vessel has been lawfully sold before seizure there is no right to seize as prize the proceeds of sale.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Lord Robert Cecil, to request that you will take into consideration the accompanying copies of correspondence with the Swedish Minister and with His Majesty's Ambassador in Paris, as shown in the annexed Schedule, relative to the claim of the Swedish Government that His Majesty's Government have no right to be informed of the names of the intended recipients of goods imported by that (the Swedish) Government or by a Government Commission, and admittedly destined for distribution among private persons, or to receive any guarantees that such goods will not be re-exported to an enemy country in any form.

In a telegram (Marked A) of the 13th May, His Majesty's Customs at Stornoway, reported that the Swedish steamship "Liguria" was detained at that port with a cargo of cotton-seed oil, oleo stock, oleo oil, and lard, consigned to the Royal Swedish Government Victualling Commission. In a note of the 27th May (Marked B), the Swedish Minister was requested to furnish His Majesty's Government either with precise information as to the real destination and consignees of the consignments on board this vessel, or with a guarantee that the goods would not be re-exported from Sweden in any form. In his reply of the 2nd June (Marked C), Count Wrangel stated that the Swedish Government did not consider themselves bound either to give the names of persons for whom the goods were ultimately destined, or to give any guarantee beyond what lay in the fact itself, that import would take place under the control of the Commission, who, it was stated, take precautions to see that goods imported through them are exclusively consumed in Sweden. In a further note to the Swedish Minister (Marked D), Lord Robert Cecil gave at some length the reasons for which His Majesty's Government considered themselves entitled to insist on receiving either the information or the guarantees for which they had asked. A statement of what is known of the constitution and functions of the Swedish Victualling Commission, as well as of the reasons of policy on which the action of the Foreign Office is based, are explained in a despatch to His Majesty's Ambassador in Paris, dated the 21st June (Marked E).

Lord Robert Cecil is impressed with the difficulty which may arise in carrying out the present policy of His Majesty's Government of intercepting all commerce on its way to or from the enemy country, if the Governments of neutral countries adjacent to the enemy adopt the practice of importing goods themselves which are really intended for private parties, and I am to request that you will be good enough to favour him with your opinion generally as to the best line to adopt in meeting any complaints put forward by or on behalf of such neutral Governments if goods so consigned are detained for Prize Court proceedings. In particular he would be glad to receive your opinion whether consignments to a Government Department, or Commission, or other Government institution which does not itself intend to use the goods can be treated (a) as exposing the vessel to condemnation on the ground that it renders the papers false, or (b) as throwing on the claimant the onus of proving the absence of hostile destination, because the ship's papers fail to show the real consignee of the goods, or (c) as justifying the detention of the ship on the grounds that the papers conceal, or fail to provide, information which the belligerent is entitled to look to the ship's papers to provide, and to detain the ship until it is provided.

Report.

1. In our opinion no neutral Government is entitled to extend its protection over its own commerce in such a way as to defeat belligerent rights. The Victualling Commission is not engaged in supplying the Swedish Government, and cannot rely upon its position as a Government Department to enable private merchants to escape from the belligerent rights of this country. The objection is in principle the objection which prevailed against the claim formerly put forward by neutral Governments to protect the ships of their nationals from visit and search by the convoy of public vessels.

2.—(a.) Unless the Commission is a mere cloak to cover the operations of the real importer the papers are not false.

(b.) The onus would be on the claimants.

(c.) Detention cannot be justified except during the pendency of Prize Court proceedings, or for the purpose of reasonable preliminary enquiries. Information having now been definitely refused, we do not think that further detention without Prize Court proceedings could be justified. As the onus is upon the claimants, the Prize Court would make the appropriate Order unless the claimants discharged that onus. It would depend upon the facts of each case whether the Order would be confiscation or detention and sale under the Retaliatory Order.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. R. A. Wright.

WE think that the certificates and attestations as to the destruction of securities should be stopped and brought into the Prize Court as coming within the definition of negotiable securities.

It may be that this course involves some straining of the language of the Contraband Order, but on the other hand the case is one of a flagrant attempt to evade the contraband policy of the British Government in regard to the transmission of enemy securities. The certificates in question are simply substitutes for negotiable securities, and may on that ground be treated in Prize in the same way as the negotiable securities which they represent for purposes of the sea voyage. Further, the certificates are in fact documents capable of being realised in the sense, not perhaps of being directly turned into money, but of being turned into the paper equivalent of money, and so may be treated in the Prize Courts as realisable securities. They have, in fact, a distinct resemblance to share warrants to bearer, which can be converted into registered securities.

We recognise that the question raised is not free from doubt and difficulty, but, for the reasons stated above, we think these documents should be seized and treated either under the Order in Council of the 11th March, 1915, or as contraband, at all events until it be held (if it ever is) by the Prize Court or Privy Council that they do not come within the Order or the Contraband declaration.

"enemy" in articles 3, 4, and 6 of
Order in Council of March 11,
1915.
Case of S.S. "Con-stantinos": question of appeal.

The opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel is desired with regard to the advisability of prosecuting the appeal which is now pending from the decision of Cator P. in the case of the steamship "Constantinos," which involves the question whether the Order in Council of the 11th March, 1915, is applicable to German trade only, or to the trade of the Allies of Germany as well.

The facts of the particular case under appeal are as follows:—

The steamship "Constantinos" (a Greek steamer carrying a cargo of rice and other foodstuffs) was on a voyage from a Greek port to Smyrna. She was intercepted and brought into Mudros for examination, and she and her cargo seized as prize. The main ground of appeal which has been alleged, and on which it is proposed to rely, is that her cargo is liable to detention under the Order in Council of the 11th March, 1915, by reason of her carrying goods with an enemy destination. The President, as will be seen from the report of the Judgment which is sent herewith, held that the Order in Council applies to reprisals to be taken against Germany alone; that the word "enemy," as used in article 3, refers only to Germany, and that a decree under the Order in Council could therefore not be made.

Attention is called to the terms of the Order in Council of the 11th March, 1915, which was published in the issue of the "London Gazette" of the 16th March, 1915, and may be found in the third supplement to the "Manual of Emergency Legislation," p. 513 (where a title is added, namely, "Reprisals Restricting German Commerce," "Order in Council framing reprisals for restricting further the commerce of Germany.")

The Order begins with a recital that a case for reprisals has arisen against Germany by reason of her disregard of international law and the laws of humanity. Following on the recitals, four cases are set out in which vessels may be detained and their cargoes discharged. The first two cases deal with commerce to and from a German port; the third and fourth cases, however, refer to vessels carrying goods with an enemy destination, or which are enemy property or of enemy origin. It is upon the construction which should be applied to the adjective "enemy" as used in articles 3 and 4 that the opinion of the Law Officers and Counsel is desired.

The Foreign Office have pronounced that the object with which the word "German" was used in the first two articles and the terms "enemy destination," &c., in articles 3 and 4 was, because, at the time of the preparation of the Order, His Majesty's Government had decided to cut off all direct trade to and from Germany, but to what extent they had decided to go beyond that, was uncertain.

It is to be noted that the corresponding French Decree of the 13th March, 1915, a copy of which is sent herewith, is limited in terms to German commerce.

The question whether the word "enemy" refers to the allies of Germany as well as to Germany herself is primarily one of construction, though a further matter may have to be considered, namely, how far the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of the steamship "Zamora" would permit of any but a strict construction being placed on the word for the purpose of preserving the validity of the Order in Council as a whole.

First then, with regard to the point of construction. It may be convenient if some of the arguments are noted for the two contrary contentions which may be urged.

(a.) In favour of the view that the word "enemy" refers to Germany alone, reference may in the first place be made to the reasons put forward by Cator P., in his judgment in the case of the steamship "Constantinos." In addition to these arguments it may be contended that the preamble may, and in case of ambiguity should, be looked at to ascertain the meaning of the operative part of the Order (cf. in the case of the construction of an Act of Parliament, Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Company, 1899 A.C., at pp. 185 and 193, Fletcher v. Birkenhead Corporation, 1907, 1 K.B., at p. 218). A preamble is an integral part of a statute, and may afford useful light as to what the statute intends to reach—"a key to open the meaning of the makers of the Act, and the mischief it was intended to remedy," 4 Coke Inst. 330. The recitals to the Order in Council clearly set out as its foundation a case for retaliatory measures against Germany. In the third recital the word "enemy" obviously refers to Germany alone. It may be observed that Evans P. has referred to the preambles of The Hague Conventions in construing the meaning of their provisions. Thus, in the case of the steamship "Belgia" (British and Colonial Prize Cases, vol. i, at p. 307) he referred to the preamble to the Sixth Convention; as he also did in the case of the steamship "Prinz Adalbert," 1916, P., at p. 87, where he condemned a German ship which was in a British port on the outbreak of war, on the ground that the master was not using the port as contemplated in the preamble to the Convention, though the vessel was, strictly speaking, within the protection literally given by the terms of the first article of the Convention.

So far as can be gathered from the terms of the Order in Council itself, Great Britain has no enemy other than Germany, and no reference is to be found anywhere to Germany's Allies, though the Allies of Great Britain are named. The last recital names Germany as the country which commodities are to be prevented from reaching and leaving. In view of the sole reference to Germany in the recitals and in the first two articles of the Order, it is contended that when one comes to articles 3 and 4 the adjective "enemy" can be no more than a synonym for "German." Article 3, in particular, is an application of the doctrine of continuous voyage, or continuous transport, of goods of a non-contraband character, and should therefore be regarded as aimed at goods with a German destination and goods which are German property only. Moreover, the last article appears strictly to limit the application of the measures to be taken to Germany, for it provides that "nothing in this Order shall prevent the relaxation of the provisions of this Order in respect of the merchant vessels of any country which declares that no commerce intended for or originating in Germany or belonging to German subjects shall enjoy the protection of its flag."

The case of Bulgaria, too, requires consideration. Bulgaria did not enter the war on the side of the enemy until seven months after the issue of the Order in Council; and it is thus difficult to contend that the intention was to include this Power among those against whom the Order was directed.

(b.) On the other hand the following points may be urged against the narrow view that the word "enemy" refers only to Germany. Too much weight it may be contended should not be given to the Recitals, and the natural and ordinary construction should be given to the word "enemy." It is not unreasonable to find the word "German" in the Recitals, as it was notorious that the German Government in fact controlled its allies and the military operations in Europe and Asia. It was also notorious that, owing to her geographical position, foreign supplies of goods—whether for herself or her allies—would come mainly through Scandinavian and Baltic ports. Accordingly the phrase "German ports" is specifically mentioned in the first two articles of the Order. An exception to the detention of the commerce to be stopped is expressly made in favour of neutral property; that is to say, not merely no German property but no enemy property (that is, Austrian, Ottoman, or Bulgarian) can go forward. The distinction here is implicit between "neutral" and "enemy." In article 3 the phrase "enemy property" is found: the very phrase which was necessarily implied in article 2. Nothing but "enemy property" is stopped: here, again, the distinction is implicit between "neutral" and "enemy." In article 4, both expressions "enemy property" and "neutral property" are found, and the distinction which was implicit in articles 2 and 3 is now explicit. "Neutral" property is exempted: "enemy" property is not. Austrian, Turkish, or Bulgarian property is not neutral, and so is not exempted. In article 6 there is again found the explicit antithesis between "neutral" and "enemy"—which is the ordinary antithesis in international law.

Moreover, as the Order in Council treats only of enemy goods and neutral goods, no provision is to be found affecting Austrian or other enemy goods, should the narrower construction be adopted. Unless, therefore, it is possible to invent a third category, viz., goods which are not dealt with by the Order in Council at all, Austrian, Turkish, and Bulgarian goods, and goods destined for those countries must go free.

With regard to the difficulty of reading the word "enemy" as including Bulgaria, there is no greater objection to the use of the word as connoting those who shall adhere, than there is to its connoting those who have adhered, to the main unit of the hostile combination.

In addition to the above arguments, it appears material to consider to what extent, if any, the question of the true construction to be placed upon the Order in Council is affected by the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of the steamship "Zamora." A print of the Judgment in that case is sent herewith, and a report of it will be found in 32 "Times" L.R. at p. 436.

It may be suggested that the effect of this decision is that in so far as the Order in Council prescribes a legitimate method of reprisals against an enemy it is valid by international law; while in so far as those methods cannot be said to be reasonably taken in retaliation against an enemy it cannot be supported.

In considering the present question it is submitted that discrimination may have to be made between German commerce and the commerce of Austria-Hungary, Turkey, and Bulgaria; that the judgment of the Judicial Committee, in laying stress on the Recitals to the Order in Council, points the necessity of having full regard to the Recitals in construing the meaning to be placed on the operative part of the Order, and that in so far as the Order may only be valid as a retaliatory measure, it affects no enemy other than that particular nation, against whom the right to take reprisals is declared to exist. Considerable difficulty may be felt in contending that measures can be taken against (A) for the illegal acts of (B). But on the other hand, the Central Powers are so closely connected and inter-organised in the conduct of the war, in the maintenance of their commercial enterprises and the support of their non-combatant population, that in addition to being largely ineffectual it would be impracticable to retaliate against one Power only.

In the case of the steamship "Eperos," a print of which is sent herewith, the Judge of the Prize Court sitting at Malta held that goods carried on a Greek steamer bound for Salonika were intended for the enemy, and therefore the case fell within article 3 of the Order in Council. The point, however, as to whether Turkey was an "enemy" within the meaning of the Order was not raised or argued, and the decision cannot therefore be considered as carrying much weight.

In the case of the steamship "Eretria" the same Court had a similar point before it, when the question was raised and argued; but no actual decision upon the point appears to have been given, as the orders which were made in the case appear to have been rather in the nature of consent orders than otherwise.

The argument to be adduced on the present appeal (the steamship "Constantinos") will be primarily with reference to the true construction to be placed upon the Order in Council. If the Order in Council be construed as affecting German commerce only, the question of the validity of the Order would not come in question. On the other hand if the word "enemy" be construed as including Turkey, then it is conceived there would be involved the determination by the Privy Council of the general question whether the Order in Council as a whole is valid. On the hearing of this appeal it may be difficult to detach the general question of validity from the narrow point of construction; and in this connection the Foreign Office have intimated that if the presentation of the appeal involves opening up this general question it should be considered whether the enforcement of the Order in Council in respect of Turkey is of sufficient importance to justify the incurring of the risk of a decision by the Privy Council that the Order is inconsistent with international law.

The advice of the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel is therefore sought whether in these circumstances it is expedient that the Appeal should be prosecuted further. The point of construction whether Turkey is affected by the Order in Council is no longer of any materiality, because the Mediterranean coasts of Turkey are now blockaded.

The larger question, however—whether the Order in Council is valid jure gentium —is one of such importance, that a further case directed solely to this question is in course of preparation for placing before the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel, as it is thought that the matter should be presented for their consideration detached from the special circumstances applying in the case of the present appeal.

The opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel is therefore desired upon the following questions:—

1. Whether the word "enemy" in articles 3 and 4 of the Order in Council of the 11th March, 1915, refers to Germany only, or refers to Germany and her allies
2. Whether the appeal in the case of the steamship "Constantinos" from the decision of Cator P., dated the 16th March, 1916, should be proceeded with.
3. Generally.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. R. A. Wright.

1. The arguments on both sides in regard to this question are very fully presented in the case laid before us. On the one hand there is considerable force in the contention that it cannot have been intended to limit in articles 1 and 2 the prohibition of direct maritime commerce to German ports, and yet in articles 3 and 4 to extend the prohibition of continuous commerce to all enemy destinations or origins. Reliance will certainly be placed also on the recitals (which may be referred to if the operative clauses are ambiguous), and particularly on the fact that the reprisals are founded on German breaches of the usages of war, and are expressly threatened against Germany alone; and the different treatment accorded under the Fifth Hague Convention to Austrian vessels may be emphasised. In view of the final recital, the fact that the French Order is directed against Germany only is significant. Further, it may be doubted whether, on the facts stated in the recital, the Order if extending to all enemy countries would be valid; and this consideration would have great weight on the question of construction.

On the other hand, the use of the word enemy in the operative articles 3 and 4, as distinguished from the use of the word German in articles 1 and 2, is very marked, and the Court might regard that distinction as intentional, especially in view of the fact that Germany controls its allies and the disposition of their resources from the North Sea to Mesopotamia. If it is an essential part of British policy that goods should be prevented from going into or out of Germany to America, Scandinavia, Spain, or Greece, it may be considered to be equally essential that they should be prevented from entering or leaving the allied countries which form a continuous territory. The word enemy in article 6 seems to have the wider meaning.

The respective arguments are closely balanced, but we think there is grave risk that the arguments in favour of the narrower construction of the order would prevail, and it would be held that the word "enemy" in articles 3 and 4 means "German."

2. For the above reasons we are of opinion that it will be better not to proceed with the appeal against the judgment of Judge Cator, but if it is desired to argue the point to wait until it arises (if at all) in the Prize Court of the United Kingdom.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 4, 1915.

Enemy

Niger and enemy subjects in Nigeria:
Conventional rights and rights under international law.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to enclose for your consideration copy of a note (Paper A) from the United States Ambassador in London covering a copy of a letter from a Mr. Brünner, a German subject, and a note from the German Government complaining of certain acts of the Government of Nigeria, which constitute, it is alleged, an infringement of articles 30 and 33 of the Berlin Act of the 26th February, 1885, guaranteeing the free navigation of the Niger by ships of all nations and the protection of merchants of all nationalities in the protectorate in time of war as in time of peace. The obligations imposed on His Majesty's Government towards the German Empire by these articles were confirmed by article 6 of the Anglo-German Convention of the 15th November, 1893, respecting boundaries in Africa. Copies of these two instruments are enclosed (Papers B and C).

The treatment actually accorded to German subjects and merchant ships in the protectorate after the outbreak of war is described in a telegram of the 15th August, 1914, from the deputy of the Governor-General of Nigeria to the Secretary of State for the Colonies and in a despatch of the 14th May last from the Governor-General, copies of which are enclosed (Papers D and E). A copy of the instructions from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, to which the Governor-General states that he conformed in the case of the German steamship "Diana" forms Enclosure F in this letter.

Copies of the correspondence which has passed between the Colonial Office and this Department on the subject are also enclosed.* It will be observed that Sir E. Grey feels some doubt, which the Secretary of State for the Colonies, however, does not share, as to whether the action of the local authorities can be entirely justified in view of the terms of the conventional provisions relating to the matter.

In these circumstances Sir E. Grey would be glad if you would take the enclosed papers into your consideration and would favour him with your opinion whether the action taken by the authorities in the protectorate as described in Enclosures D and E involve any breach of international law as contained in the Berlin Act or otherwise, and as to the terms of the reply which should, in your opinion, be addressed to the United States Ambassador.

He would also be glad to be favoured with any observations on the subject of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.
W. LANGLEY.

Report.

We deal first with the arrests. It appears that all the persons arrested were German reservists, with the exception of one man who was offered his liberty, but preferred to be interned with his fellow subjects. Some of the arrested persons, including Brünner (who had been treated with much consideration), were guilty of suspicious conduct, and a rising in the country behind Warri was attributed to German intrigue. We do not think that the provisions of the Berlin Act in question, which relate exclusively to the freedom of the navigation of the Niger, can be construed as limiting or derogating from the right to arrest and intern or deport enemy subjects in British territory when such a course is for military reasons expedient, whether on the ground that enemy subjects are reservists or are fomenting risings or otherwise.

Next as to the ships. It may perhaps be doubted whether articles 30 and 33 of the Niger clauses in the Act of Berlin were intended to give to the vessels of enemy subjects using the Niger (including vessels in British Niger ports) absolute immunity from seizure in time of war. But however that may be, it does not appear to us that there has been any breach of those articles by the authorities of the protectorate. On the outbreak of war permission was given to Mr. Brünner's company to continue its operations on terms which were accepted by him; but on the arrest of the employees of the company it was no longer possible for the company to continue trading as before, and provision had to be made for the custody of its vessels. Some of these have been kept under guardianship or handed over to the care of the receiver of enemy property. Others have been used for State purposes, the obligation of paying to the receiver fair compensation for their use being fully recognised. No question of freedom of navigation or of the usages of commerce has since arisen; and it is difficult to see what other course could have been followed having regard to the arrest of all the members of the company's staff.

In the above circumstances it does not appear to us that the action taken by the authorities of the protectorate as described in papers D and E involves any breach of international law as contained in the Berlin Act or otherwise.

We think that a reply should be sent to the American Ambassador in the above sense.

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, Mr. Austen-Cartmell and Mr. Branson.

HEREWITH is sent—

Copy inter-departmental minutes and letters. The only available copy print of the Constitution of Bulgaria (obtained from the Foreign Office library) accompanies the Attorney-General's papers.

1. An opinion is desired on the question whether the private property situate in this country, including securities of foreign obligations and belonging to an enemy Sovereign, can be confiscated by the Crown under international law.

It appears that the Czar of the Bulgarians has certain securities, British and foreign, which Messrs. Coutts hold as bankers on his behalf.

From the copy of the return dated the 8th November, 1915 (which will be found in papers herewith), made by Messrs. Coutts to the Public Trustee, it seems that most of the securities are bearer bonds or securities presumably held in the name of the Czar of the Bulgarians. There are, however, a few which are held in the joint names of other persons and one which is held in the name of Messrs. Coutts.

If it should be considered that the right to confiscate is, if not unwarranted, at any rate doubtful, the question arises whether a vesting order and an order for sale should be obtained under the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1916 (5 & 6 Geo. V, cap. 105, sec. 4).

F

Securities in England belonging to the King of Bulgaria are liable to confiscation.

If such orders were obtained, would such proceeding prejudice or preclude the Government from subsequently contending that the property was lawfully liable to confiscation?

2. It will be seen from the copies of official minutes herewith that, on the suggestion of the Treasury Solicitor, the matter was referred by the Treasury to the Foreign Office for consideration, and that it was considered by the Legal Adviser of the Foreign Office that this property stood on the same footing as that of an individual private enemy, and Sir Edward Grey decided that the property should be kept in reserve until the end of the war. Apparently his view is that, as a matter of policy, it would be a mistake to confiscate King Ferdinand's private property here. It may be noted that, although it is stated that this is King Ferdinand's private property, it is just possible that this is public property of the Bulgarian Government put in the name of the King for the express purpose of evading confiscation; but the Treasury Solicitor has no information in confirmation of this suggestion. When the matter came back to the Treasury, Mr. Montagu, in a minute to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, expressed a preference for confiscation if it were possible, and as a result the Treasury Solicitor was instructed to obtain the opinion of the Law Officers on the general question whether such property is liable to confiscation as well as on the particular question what steps should be taken with regard to vesting the property in the Custodian.

3. The legal position is stated in the judgment of the full Court of Appeal in Porter v. Freudenberg—(1915) 1 K.B., at pages 869-970—which seems to establish that the legal right of confiscating private enemy property still exists, but that it has, as a matter of practice, ceased to be exercised. The property of the enemy Government, on the other hand, is still confiscated in practice. It is not necessary to deal with this subject in this case at any length; it will be sufficient to refer the Law Officers and Counsel to Pitt Cobbett's "Leading Cases on International Law" (3rd Ed., 1913, Part 2, pages 52 to 62), and Westlake's "International Law" (Part 2, Edition 1913, pages 41 to 48 and page 51), where the whole subject is completely dealt with. The point is also referred to in the judgment of the Judicial Committee in the "Roumanian" (Treher's Prize Cases, page 545). Lord Parker in his judgment uses the expression, "No one will now contend that the property of enemy subjects found within the realm at the commencement of a war can be seized and appropriated by the Crown;" but that appears to be quoted by him as part of an argument, and not to be put forward as his own statement. The statement of the Judicial Committee on the subject is a little lower down on the same page: it is that the Crown has ceased to exercise its ancient rights of seizing, &c., the goods of enemy subjects on land, because the advantage to be thus gained has been small compared with the injury thereby entailed on private individuals, and in order to ensure similar treatment of British goods on enemy territory. See also A.-G. v. Wheeden (1699), Parker 267. The last case of confiscation of private property generally given is that of 1793, at the outbreak of war between Great Britain and France. Oppenheim treats the rule of confiscation of private property as now non-existent, and affirms that there is a customary rule of international law in existence prohibiting the confiscation of private enemy property and the annulment of enemy debts on the territory of a belligerent ("International Law" II, section 102). Hall does not go so far, and says that, "although seizure would always now be looked upon with extreme disfavour, it would be unsafe to declare that it is not generally within the bare rights of war" ("International Law," 6th Ed., page 431). Oppenheim, however, adds that the rule does not prevent a belligerent from seizing public enemy property on his territory, such as funds, ammunition, &c. Hall also (page 435) says: "For the present, therefore, it cannot be said that a belligerent does a distinctly illegal act in confiscating such personal property of his enemies existing within his jurisdiction as is not secured upon the public faith." These last words have reference to the rule given by Westlake that "neither the principal nor the interest of a State debt can be confiscated or sequestrated because the individuals to whom it is due are enemy subjects" ("War," page 41).

See also Ferguson, "Manual of International Law," The Hague, 1894, Vol. II, page 284, a Dutch work: "All public property of the enemy State is per se hostile, but private property, i.e., property of private individuals, is only rendered hostile by the acts of its owner, by the circumstances of its use or dispositions with relation to the war, or by the interdiction mentioned in the preceding paragraph" (i.e., as regards prohibition of continued residence in enemy State).

The subject is treated at length in Manning's "Law of Nations" (Ed. S. Amos, 1875), pages 170-175; see also Woolsey's "International Law" (6th Ed., 1888), section 124.

It seems to have been considered by the Foreign Office in this case that the private property of the King of Bulgaria stood in the same position as that of any other private enemy individual. The Treasury, however, seem to question this, and it may be pointed out that none of the authorities who state the establishment of the modern practice (which appears to be only a little more than a century old) with respect to private property of individuals have ever applied this case to the property of a belligerent Sovereign; nor does there seem to be any precedent in point for such a case. It may well be contended—if it is thought wise policy to do so—that the position of a belligerent Sovereign like the King of Bulgaria may be distinguished from that of a private enemy individual. So far as the exemption of the latter depends on the modern conception that war is carried on, not as against the individuals of the belligerent State, but as against the Government and authority of the same, the belligerent Sovereign can hardly fail to be identified with the Government. Whatever may be the written Constitution of Bulgaria, the view may reasonably be taken that the King of Bulgaria is in substance the controlling power of that State. If the rule of exemption depends on hardship to individuals—who are not supposed to be personally responsible for the policy of their State—that can hardly apply to the belligerent Sovereign, who is himself personally responsible for his State taking part in the war. So far as the question of reprisals or of pressure on the belligerent Government is concerned, it is clear that that can be much more effectively exercised by confiscation, or a threat of confiscation, of the property of the belligerent Sovereign, who can himself control the policy of his Government, than upon that of any private individual, however powerful. It may therefore be contended that the law of comity or of international law, so called, should not be extended beyond the class of cases to which it has been hitherto applied, and that in this case the British Government would be infringing no recognised rule of international law if, at the end of the war, they thought fit to confiscate this property. It is suggested, therefore, for the consideration of the Law Officers that, although it may not be desirable, and it is not the wish of Sir Edward Grey, that any definite step should be taken at the present moment, the property should be seized in such a way as to distinguish it from the property of private enemy individuals, and not be subjected to the ordinary procedure of vesting in the Public Trustee, which might be held to indicate that it is to be dealt with in the same way as the property of enemy individuals. It is suggested that it is desirable to put a special mark on this property, and show clearly to the world that the British Government are not prepared to commit themselves to the view that the property of the belligerent Sovereign is to be treated on the same footing as that of any private enemy individual. There can be no question as to the legal right of the Government to sequester this property, and of course they are not bound to follow the procedure of the Trading with the Enemy Acts. The mere sequestration of property clearly contravenes no principal of international law.

4. Counsel may perhaps not think it material to consider the nature of the Constitution of Bulgaria in this connection, but a print of the Constitution established in 1911 is with the Attorney-General's papers.

The Kingdom of Bulgaria is declared to be an hereditary monarchy with a National Assembly. (Article 1.)

The King is the supreme representative and Chief of the State. The legislative power belongs to the King and to the Representative Assembly. (Articles 9 and 10.)

The King is the head of all the military forces, and has the executive power, Articles 11 and 12, and by Article 17 represents the State in all foreign relations, but it seems that perhaps at all events a very large class of treaties cannot be concluded without the vote of the National Assembly.

Laws have to be presented for the sanction of the King after being passed by the National Assembly (see Articles 43, &c.).

Articles 51 and 53 are important, because they show that the public property of the State is not under the control of the King, and therefore must be considered separate from his private property.

Article 152. Ministers are nominated and dismissed by the King, but appear to be responsible to the King and to the National Assembly. (Article 153.)

It is stated in Dicey's "Peasant State," written in 1894, that under the former Constitution the Prince had an income of 24,000*l.* a year guaranteed him by the Constitution, but there is nothing about that in the present Constitution.

5. As regards the procedure to be followed, the position of the Public Trustee as the Custodian is defined by the Trading with the Enemy (Amendment) Act, 1914, which concerns the property of enemies, by reference to the definition contained in proclamations for the time being (see Section 14 (2)). The Trading with the Enemy Proclamation No. 2, of the 9th September, 1914 (page 378 of the "Manual of Emergency Legislation," Part I), is well known to Counsel, and although the definition of "enemy" there, including any persons resident or carrying on business in the enemy country, does of course in so many words extend to the Sovereign of the country, it is doubtful whether the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1914, does not by its whole scope indicate that what is intended to be dealt with is the private property of individual enemies rather than the property of the Sovereign. It is true that under section 5 of the Act the Custodian is to hold the property after the war in such manner as may be directed by Order in Council; but the same section contains a provision enabling the Court to provide for the debts of the enemy being paid out of the property held by the Custodian. The legislation in regard to the Custodian has been amended by the Trading with Enemy Act, 1915, and by the further Act of 1916, which, by section 4, gives power to the Board of Trade to vest in the Custodian property of this description. It may be felt, however, that if this property were dealt with under this Statute it would in a sense be ear-marked as falling into the same category as ordinary private property of individuals, and for that reason it might be preferable for the Crown simply to require Messrs. Coutts to hand over the securities to them (which it is not to be supposed they will refuse to do), or perhaps to undertake to hold them on behalf of the Government, together with the dividends accruing.

Attention is called to the Minute of the Parliamentary Counsel of the 6th April, 1916.

There are questions of detail as regards the nature of some of the securities and as regards the receipt of dividends thereon, with which it is not considered necessary to trouble the Law Officers and Counsel at the present moment.

The Law Officers and Counsel are requested to advise:—

1. Whether the securities referred to are properly liable to confiscation.
2. Whether the obtaining of orders vesting them in the Public Trustee would be in order and non-prejudicial to the position of the Government in subsequently raising such contention as they may be advised.
3. Generally on the case.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, Mr. J. Austen-Cartmell and Mr. G. A. H. Branson.

1. In our opinion the presumption is that the King of Bulgaria is identified with the State; and the provisions of the Constitution do not displace that presumption. Perhaps, they even support it.

However this may be, the reasoning which has led in universal practice to the confiscation of enemy State property applies to the property of an enemy Sovereign, and the reasoning which has led to the discontinuance of the practice in dealing with the private property of enemy individuals does not apply to the property of an enemy Sovereign.

We therefore think that the securities in question may properly be confiscated. Whether such confiscation should take place at once or not is a matter of policy on which we offer no opinion.

2. We think it desirable as a matter of legal policy to draw a distinction between the treatment of these securities, and of securities or property which are not claimed as confiscable. Holding this view, we need not consider whether in law the obtaining of Orders vesting these securities in the Public Trustee would or might prejudice the position of the Government hereafter.

We recommend that Messrs. Coutts be required to hand over the securities to a nominee of the Crown to be dealt with as His Majesty may hereafter direct.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, October 30, 1915.

I HAVE the honour by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey to transmit to you herewith the papers shown in the schedule hereto on the subject of the claim of Mr. Paul Scheerer, an American citizen of German extraction, until lately carrying on business in Trinidad.

Mr. Paul Scheerer: Exclusion from Trinidad, and compulsory liquidation of his business.

The facts of the case are set out, on the whole accurately, in two pamphlets (see enclosures in paper No. 14) prepared by Mr. Scheerer's American lawyer, and submitted to the Department of State. They may, for convenience sake, be shortly summarised as follows:—

Mr. Scheerer, who was born in Germany in 1868, went to the United States in 1889, and was naturalised in 1894. In 1896 he went to Trinidad and engaged in business there as a clerk. In 1897 he commenced business on his own account under the name of Paul H. Scheerer and Co. in partnership with a Mr. Benlisa, a resident of Trinidad. The partnership was dissolved in 1900, and from that date until the 1st July, 1912, the business was conducted alone by Mr. Scheerer under the same name.

On the 1st July, 1912, Mr. Scheerer admitted one Paul Kocher to partnership in the business. Mr. Kocher, who had been a clerk of Mr. Scheerer's for ten years, and had married his stepdaughter, was, and is, a German subject. The managing clerk and other members of the staff were also German subjects. The partnership agreement will be found on p. 27 of the first of the above-mentioned pamphlets (paper No. 14), but, according to Mr. Scheerer's statement, it was supplemented by a parol agreement, the alleged effect of which will be found stated on pp. 2 and 3 of the same pamphlet.

According to Mr. Scheerer's statement, which there is in this respect no reason to disbelieve, the business was exceptionally prosperous, and became one of the largest in the island.

In May 1914 Mr. Scheerer left Trinidad and proceeded to Germany in order, according to his statement, to have a surgical operation performed upon himself. At the outbreak of the war he was still in Germany, but returned to New York in November. During his absence his partner was in charge of the business.

On the 31st October, 1914, in accordance with instructions issued by the Colonial Office (paper No. 1), a proclamation was issued by the Governor of Trinidad prohibiting the carrying on of business in the colony by persons of German or Austrian nationality, and providing for the winding up by a liquidating committee of businesses carried on by, for, or on behalf of any alien enemy. The proclamation will be found on pp. 38 and 39 of the second pamphlet (paper No. 14). On the 7th November Mr. Kocher and the German managing clerk were both interned as alien enemies. On the 20th November an ordinance was passed amplifying the above proclamation. This ordinance will be found on pp. 12 to 17 in the second pamphlet (paper No. 14). The Liquidating Committee provided for by the proclamation and ordinance at once commenced operations, and all businesses of alien enemies were taken in hand. It appears that there was at first some uncertainty as to whether the business of Paul Scheerer and Co. ought to be dealt with under the terms of the proclamation and ordinance; but the Liquidating Committee strongly represented that it should be so dealt with, and after reference to the Colonial Office the business was closed down, and a manager was appointed to wind up the business. Mr. Scheerer's own property, as distinct from that of his firm, was not interfered with.

The Governor of Trinidad raised objections to Mr. Scheerer's being allowed to return to the island, and he accordingly employed a Mr. Edwards, a New York lawyer, to proceed to Trinidad and represent his interests. In January 1915, in consequence of representations made by Mr. Edwards, Mr. Scheerer was allowed to return to the island temporarily to arrange his business, but he was not allowed to remain permanently, and the liquidation of the business is proceeding. Mr. Scheerer is stated by the Governor to be thoroughly pro-German in his views.

Various allegations as to the conduct of the liquidation are made by Mr. Scheerer in the two pamphlets, but it appears unnecessary to go into them in detail. It should be noted, however, that Mr. Scheerer alleges that the liquidation of his business was due to the machinations of his business rivals, and the action of the Colonial authorities was not bonâ fide. It does not appear that there is any foundation for these allegations. It is, however, stated by the Governor that before the liquidation of the business the firm under the direction of Mr. Kocher had made several attempts to trade with the enemy, and that Mr. Scheerer during his absence from Trinidad aided and abetted the firm in so doing. The Governor of Trinidad has been asked to supply details in support of this assertion.

It appears that at a later stage the Trinidad authorities felt some doubt as to whether the business of Paul Scheerer & Co. came properly within the definition of "enemy business" in the November ordinance, and in consequence an ordinance was passed in March 1915 providing, inter alia, that "the specific directions given by the Governor under the provisions of the principal ordinance for a business to be dealt with as an enemy business, whether given before or after the commencement of this ordinance, shall be conclusive evidence in all Courts and for all purposes that such business as aforesaid is or was an enemy business."

The American consul protested against the passing of this ordinance in his letter of the 9th March, 1915.

It should also be noted that section 4 (1) of the November ordinance provides that, "in and for the purpose of carrying out the powers and duties conferred or imposed by this ordinance, the Liquidating Committee may sue in the name of the chairman, but may not be sued."

Mr. Scheerer has now through Mr. Edwards laid his case before the State Department, and the American Ambassador has made various representations on the subject (papers Nos. 5, 14, 15, 16, and 24). Mr. Edwards' contentions will be found summarised in a note of an interview which was accorded him at the request of Dr. Page at the Foreign Office. (Paper No. 28.)

Mr. Scheerer is making a claim for upwards of 2,000,000 dollars; and as the case also raises some important questions of law, it is desired to obtain the opinion of the Law Officers, both as to the method in which this particular case should be dealt with and as to the various legal questions involved in it.

Sir E. Grey is advised that, as Mr. Scheerer contends that his business did not fall within the scope of the local legislation on the subject of enemy businesses, his proper course was and is to apply to the local Courts for a declaration to that effect, appealing if necessary to the Privy Council. If this line can be adopted it will have the great advantage of enabling His Majesty's Government to reply to the representations of the United States Government that Mr. Scheerer has not exhausted his legal remedies, and that until he has done so the case is not one for diplomatic intervention. The difficulty in the way of adopting this course lies, however, in the above-quoted provision of the March ordinance, and it therefore appears necessary that the Government of Trinidad should be instructed to repeal that provision. Sir E. Grey is advised that the provision in the November ordinance preventing the Liquidating Committee from being sued would not hinder the bringing of an action for the purpose of establishing that a particular case did not fall within the ordinance at all. If this is so, it can at any rate be contended that Mr. Scheerer was at liberty to apply to the Courts at any time between November and March.

If the course proposed above should, in your opinion, be adopted, it will be very desirable to give the Trinidad authorities all the assistance possible in order that the lines on which the case is defended in the Trinidad Courts may be such as you would approve and such as could properly be maintained in the event of the case going to the Privy Council, or eventually to arbitration. The case is an important one, and as it appears likely that the United States Government will continue to press it, Sir E. Grey is extremely anxious to obtain your opinion on all the points which it raises, and as to the lines on which it should be conducted.

Similar cases have arisen in other parts of the Empire where similar legislation has been passed, and Sir E. Grey is advised that it can properly be maintained that if a particular business comes within the category of enemy businesses as defined by the local legislation, such business may properly be treated in the manner prescribed by such legislation, although the interests in it may be to a large extent neutral. The question whether a particular business does fall within the scope of such legislation is a matter to be decided by the local Courts, and if they hold that such a business is an enemy business within the terms of such local legislation, the Government of the neutral concern has no right to protest against such legislation being applied to it. Sir E. Grey would, however, be grateful for a definite ruling from you on this point. It should be stated that the definition of enemy business is in some cases very wide; for instance, in the Indian legislation on the subject any business in which enemy subjects are employed comes within the scope of the definition.

Apart from the general question, this particular case raises certain subsidiary points which will be found set out in the pamphlets and protests prepared by Mr. Edwards, and are dealt with in the letter from the Colonial Office to the Foreign Office of the 24th August (paper No. 17).

The point on which Mr. Edwards relies particularly is that the partnership between Mr. Scheerer and Mr. Kocher was dissolved either on the outbreak of the war or the passing of the Trinidad legislation on the subject of enemy businesses, and that under the parol partnership agreement the whole of the assets thereupon became vested in Mr. Scheerer. So far as can be ascertained from the papers, however, this contention was never put forward until February, and no steps were taken before that date, either by Mr. Scheerer or by Mr. Kocher, which indicated that they regarded the partnership as dissolved.

It is somewhat remarkable that Mr. Scheerer, whose solicitor was informed before the 11th January, 1915, that Mr. Scheerer's private property was not to be interfered with, should not at once have set up that the entire partnership assets became, on its alleged dissolution, Mr. Scheerer's private property, and therefore not liable to be treated as enemy property.

It is even more remarkable that the American consul who, still later, made representations on behalf of Mr. Scheerer, stated in his letter of the 9th March, 1915, that the latter had a "paramount interest," approximately five-sixths, in the business, and made no claim on his behalf to the whole of the assets as his private property under the alleged parol partnership agreement.

I am therefore to request that you will take these papers into your consideration, and will favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion on the following points:—

1. Whether the course proposed of repealing section 2 of the March ordinance, and informing the United States Government that Mr. Scheerer must seek his remedy in the local Courts, and contend there that the November ordinance should not have been applied to his business, is the proper one.
2. Whether, if this is done, section 4 (1) of the November ordinance would prevent Mr. Scheerer from obtaining any remedy to which he might otherwise be entitled in the local Courts.
3. Whether His Majesty's Government can successfully maintain the principle indicated above, that if a particular business comes within the definition of an enemy business given in the local legislation, the business may properly be dealt with under such legislation, irrespective of any neutral interests in such business and of the amount of such interests.
4. Whether the partnership between Mr. Scheerer and Mr. Kocher was dissolved (a) under international law; (b) under Trinidad law; or (c) under the alleged parol partnership agreement at any time after the outbreak of war, and, if so, when.
5. Generally, with regard to the position and the rights of Mr. Scheerer: (a) if the partnership was dissolved before the liquidation; and (b) if it were not so dissolved.
6. Whether the refusal to allow Mr. Scheerer to return to Trinidad and carry on business there can be justified and maintained.
7. Generally, on the contentions made by Mr. Edwards, as shown in paper No. 28.

Sir E. Grey would also be grateful for any further observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

The American Ambassador is pressing this case, and it is extremely desirable to decide as soon as possible on the line to be adopted in regard to it. Sir E. Grey would therefore be grateful to receive your report at your earliest convenience.

I have, &c.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown upon the first two Questions submitted in the Foreign Office Reference of October 30, 1915.

We answer the first two questions, as we are informed that the matters therein dealt with are urgent.

We are of opinion:—

1. That the March ordinance bars Scheerer's remedies, and ought not to have been passed in view of the active steps he was taking to assert his alleged rights.

We therefore recommend its repeal. Scheerer would thereupon recover his right of action, and the United States authorities can then be informed that a legal remedy is available.

2. The section only applies to the Committee.

Scheerer would have his remedy against—

(a.) The Attorney-General for a declaration.

(b.) The persons who (as he alleges) have converted his goods and trespassed on his property.

We therefore answer the first question in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, December 17, 1915.

WITH reference to the letter from this Department of the 30th October, relative to the liquidation of the business of Messrs. Paul Scheerer and Co., of Trinidad, I have the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to transmit to you herewith a copy of a letter from the Colonial Office,* with enclosures in original, covering a copy of a further despatch on the subject, which has been received from the officer administering the Government at Trinidad.

Sir E. Grey would be obliged if you could take these papers into your consideration in making your final report on the case.

It is requested that the original enclosures in this letter may eventually be returned to this Department with your reply.

I have, &c
ALGERNON LAW.

Report—

1 and 2. We have already replied to these questions in our interim Report of the 22nd November, 1915.

3. In our opinion this position can be successfully maintained.

4. The partnership between Mr. Scheerer and Mr. Kocher was not dissolved either at the outbreak of the war or at any time before possession was taken of the business under the ordinance of the 20th November, 1914. As to (a), there was no dissolution by international law, both parties being ordinarily resident and carrying on business in Trinidad. (b) Nor was the partnership automatically dissolved under Trinidad law, although proceedings for dissolution might have been successfully taken by Mr. Scheerer under section 37 of ordinance No. 30 of 1913. (c.) The alleged parcel agreement is probably a fiction. But even if it were not, Kocher, according to his own affidavit, continued a partner until the business was taken over under the proclamation of the 31st October, 1914. It is, therefore, clear that, at the time the liquidation commenced, Kocher had not ceased to be a partner under the alleged agreement.

5. The partnership not having been dissolved before the liquidation, we think that the proclamation of the 31st October, 1914, and the ordinance of the 20th November, 1914, applied to the partnership business (which was being carried on "on behalf of" both parties), and that it is being properly wound up; but Mr. Scheerer is entitled to have his share of the proceeds ascertained and paid over to him.

6. Mr. Scheerer has no legal right to return to Trinidad; but the refusal to readmit him, if without reasonable cause, may properly be made the subject of diplomatic remonstrance on the part of the United States Government (Musgrave v. Chun Teeong Toy, L.R., 1891, A.C., p. 282). That Government may, however, consider that Mr. Scheerer's German origin and pro-German sympathies, and his activity in Germany after the outbreak of war, are sufficient reasons for not readmitting him to British territory.

7. We have dealt incidentally with Mr. Edwards' contentions in his letter of the 12th August, 1915. It is certainly desirable that Mr. Scheerer's money claims should be dealt with by the Trinidad Court.

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, October 25, 1915.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to request that you will take into your consideration, and favour him with your opinion upon, the question whether Mr. L. Ch. d'Arcis, the name of whose paternal grandfather was included with those of various other individuals in letters of denization granted in the year 1840 is, on that account merely, entitled to be considered a British subject in contemplation of English law.

A certified copy of the letters patent is enclosed herewith, together with a typewritten extract therefrom for more easy reference.

H

Letters of denization: as to creation of hereditary status of British subject. Case of Mr. L. Ch. d'Arcis.

It will be seen that the terms of the grant are of the widest nature, providing as they do that the persons named in the letters patent shall as well as their heirs in all things be treated, held, reputed, and governed as liege-subjects born within the United Kingdom.

The Secretary of State, however, entertains some doubt, which is shared by His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department, in the first place as to whether the letters patent are to be interpreted as granting the status of British subjects not merely to the persons named therein but also to persons described as the "heirs" of the named persons who (1) were neither ascertained nor ascertainable at the date of grant; and (2) may be both aliens at common law by reason of birth out of His Majesty's allegiance, and also persons not included in the privileged classes of the children and grandchildren born abroad of natural born British subjects created by the Statutes 4 Geo. II, cap. 21 and 13 Geo. III, cap. 21; and secondly, as to whether if such be the correct interpretation of the letters patent it is within the prerogative of the Sovereign thus to create a kind of hereditary status of British subjects descendible as if it were a freehold estate, irrespective of the place of birth of the persons entitled, and that at a time when aliens were incapable of inheriting land in this country.

Sir Edward Grey will be glad at the same time to receive any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer on the papers now submitted to you.

A copy of a memorandum by the Legal Adviser to the Secretary of State* dealing with the various points raised is also enclosed herewith, and may prove to be useful in considering the questions at issue. I am to request that the certified copy of the letters of denization may be returned to this Office when no longer required.

I have, &c.

W. LANGLEY.

Report of Attorney-General.

It is with reluctance that I differ in a very difficult matter from the opinion of the Solicitor-General, but after careful consideration I am unable to accept his conclusions.

In my view, it is within the prerogative to confer upon the grantee under letters of denization the full rights of a natural-born British subject, including the rights of children and grandchildren under "The Foreign Protestants Naturalization Act, 1708" (7 Anne, c. 5), section 53, as explained and enlarged by "The British Naturalization Act, 1731" (4 Geo. II, c. 21), and "The British Nationality Act, 1772" (13 Geo. III, c. 21).

I am, on the whole, of opinion that the letters patent in question had this effect.

On the particular facts of Mr. d'Arcis' case, I think that his father and grandfather must both be regarded as having been natural-born British subjects. This conclusion is subject to the proviso that the former had not been born at the date of the grant, for heirs cannot mean "children already born," and such grants are not retrospective.

FREDERICK SMITH.

Report of Solicitor-General.

In my opinion the letters patent cannot be treated as conferring the status of a British subject upon the unborn heirs of the persons named therein, including those born out of the King's allegiance. The status of British nationality is not transmissible, but must be acquired by, or conferred upon, the individual (De Geer v. Stone, L.R. 22, Ch. D. 243; re Willoughby, L.R. 30, Ch. D. 324; R. v. Albany Street Police Superintendent, L.R. 1915, 3 K.B. 716). The child or grandchild of a natural-born British subject may acquire this status by birth within the allegiance, or (if born elsewhere) under the Statutes of 1730 and 1772. But the issue born out of the allegiance of a British subject who is a denizen are not within those statutes, nor can they be brought within them by any expressions contained in the letters of denization. Those letters are intended only to confer a privilege on the persons to whom they are granted, and not to take effect as a law regulating the status of their unborn descendants. Indeed, if they were expressed to have that effect, they would, in my view, be to that extent void as in excess of the prerogative. "The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914," section 1, proceeds (as regards the future) upon the above view of the law.

For the above reasons I am of opinion that L. Ch. d'Arcis is not a British subject unless he or his father was born within the King's allegiance.

The case is one of difficulty; and I need hardly add that, as the Attorney-General takes a different view, my conclusions must be regarded as open to doubt.

GEO. CAVE.

Law Officers' Department, February 8, 1916.

[As the Law Officers of the Crown differed in opinion, it was decided, with the approval of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, to refer the matter to the Lord Chancellor.]

Sir Edward Grey to the Lord Chancellor.

Sir Edward Grey presents his compliments to the Lord Chancellor and would be much obliged if his Lordship would be good enough to take into his consideration the enclosed papers dealing with the question of the national status of Mr. L. Ch. d'Arcis, the name of whose paternal grandfather was included with those of various other individuals in letters of denization granted in the year 1840.

It will be seen from the reply which the Law Officers of the Crown have returned to the reference which was submitted to them for their consideration that they differ in their views, the Attorney-General being unable to share the opinion of his colleague that Mr. d'Arcis is not to be regarded as being a British subject.

In these circumstances Sir E. Grey would be greatly obliged if the Lord Chancellor would be so good as to favour him with his opinion upon the question and with any observations of a general nature which his Lordship may be good enough to offer in connection with it.

Foreign Office, March 16, 1916.

Report of the Lord Chancellor.

The Lord Chancellor presents his compliments to Sir Edward Grey, and upon the matter referred to him for consideration, relating to the national status of Mr. L. Ch. d'Arcis he begs to report as follows:—

Letters of denization cannot, in the Lord Chancellor's opinion, be granted so as to confer the status of a British subject upon a class of unnamed and unknown persons included under the description "Heirs." The history of denization is very old. It may be found as far back as the reign of Edward IV., and the form of the letters then granted is a literal Latin rendering of the corresponding portion of the letters in the present case. It is impossible to ascertain how this formula has so long been preserved, or what was its origin. To the Lord Chancellor's mind it was due to a mistake in assuming that a status or quality of citizenship could be limited according to the limitations well known in relation to real estate. When once a man had been himself naturalised under letters of denization granted to him direct, his offspring would be in exactly the same position as those of an ordinary British citizen, and that is the whole effect of the grant. To read it in the manner suggested by the learned Attorney-General would be to provide that a man not born at the time of the grant, and not even a direct descendant of the man to whom the letters were granted, who might be in fact a German citizen, was by virtue of this grant a naturalised Englishman. The peculiarity of this result is emphasised when it is remembered that if seven sons were born to a person receiving letters of denization under conditions that would make them the naturalised subjects of a foreign country, it would only be that would make them the naturalised subjects of a foreign country; while if, on the other hand, the family had consisted of seven daughters, all of them would be British subjects.

1916

The result is so unreasonable as to emphasise what has already been said. The use of the word "Heirs" in connection with letters of denization is entirely inappropriate—is indeed incapable of any sensible legal construction, and should, in the Lord Chancellor's opinion, be wholly disregarded.

Annex.

Memorandum by Sir Edward Davidson.

This document—the letters of denization—is rather ancient history, as it was issued in 1840, four years before the first general Naturalization Act of 1844. In those days the only way of becoming naturalized was by means of a private Act of Parliament. Since the passing of general Naturalization Acts, letters of denization have been seldom resorted to, and I think have only been granted in very special circumstances (such as the case of Mr. Alma Tadema, R.A., to which I will further advert presently). Letters of denization cost much more than a certificate of naturalization. (I believe the fee is about 120*l*, which is however less than that of a private Act of Parliament, but five years previous residence is not a condition precedent, as it is under the general Naturalization Acts.)

"The right to create denizens by letters patent is a prerogative of the Crown, which though fallen into desuetude is expressly preserved by 'The Naturalization Act, 1870.'"

"Letters of denization, the grant of which is at the absolute discretion of the Crown, are obtainable upon petition to the Crown through the Home Office, and the petition must set out the circumstances which make it impossible or impracticable for the applicant to comply with the conditions of 'The Naturalization Act, 1870.' The grant may be temporary or conditional, and may either express the privileges conferred or confer all the rights of a natural-born subject, except those specifically excluded by its provisions or withheld by law."

"The grant is not retrospective, consequently the children of a denizen born out of the King's Dominions before the issuing of the letters patent do not acquire British nationality,* unless expressly included in the terms of the grant. The taking of the oath of allegiance is a condition precedent to the grant." (Halsbury's "The Laws of England," sub. tit. "Alien," Part III, § 687.)

The most recent occasion of a grant of letters of denization† with which I am personally acquainted (the Home Office will know if there are later ones) is the grant to Sir Laurence Alma Tadema when he was elected a Royal Academician. No one but a British subject can be admitted to full membership of the Royal Academy, and as at the time Sir Laurence had only resided in this country for two or three years (certainly much under five years), he was not eligible for naturalization under the general Act. He might have been naturalized by special Act of Parliament, but this would have cost more, and probably letters of denization were considered preferable. The letters were personal to himself and did not include his existing children by name so that they were excluded—a matter which subsequently caused Miss Alma Tadema a great deal of annoyance.

These letters were issued by the Home Office and until the present letters of 1840 granted to Mr. d'Arcis and others came to my notice, I was not aware that letters of denization had—even in the early part of Queen Victoria's reign—been issued by any Department other than the Home Office. The present letters appear to have been actually issued from the Privy Seal Office, and the official who affixed the seal was Mr. Edmunds.‡

These letters do things in a rather wholesale manner and include sixteen separate and apparently unrelated individuals of whom the majority, judging from their names, were German or Polish Jews. The letters grant not only to the sixteen persons who are mentioned nominatim but to "their and each of their heirs," that they shall and may be free denizens and liege-subjects of Us (Victoria R.) our heirs and successors, and that they as well as their heirs may in all things be treated, reputed, held and governed as our faithful liege-subjects born within our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

I have examined the Form of Petition for Letters Patent of Denization, which is given in the "Encyclopædia of Forms," vol. ix, p. 43 (published by Messrs. Butterworth in 1905 under the editorship of Mr. Underhill), and find that the precedent therein given follows very much the wording of the actual form now under consideration. Very probably it was based on some other actual form issued by the Home Office. The words "and that they as well as their heirs may in all things be treated, reputed, held, and governed as our faithful liege-subjects born within our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

* This is so also with regard to a private Act of Parliament.

† It is stated in Henriques' "Treatise on the Law of Aliens" (1906), p. 18, that there is no instance of letters of denization having been granted since the year 1872.

‡ I have since made further enquiry, and find that Mr. L. Edmunds was in 1840 Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and Clerk of the Letters Patent (see "Royal Calendar for 1841," pp. 221 and 222), and Mr. Thomas Plasket was the Chief Clerk of the Home Office.

The Clerk of the Crown sees to the affixing of the Great Seal to documents, and I suppose that these letters must have been under the Great Seal.

Mr. Plasket certified merely to the copy as a true copy.—W.E.D.

"Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland" are so very wide that if they had been used in an Act of Parliament such as a special Naturalization Act, they would, I think, have covered all the "heirs" (according to the meaning of that expression in English Law) of the original donees. Such wide words, however, so far as I can discover, have never been used in private Acts of Parliament conferring naturalization on individual alien donees. It seems to me at least doubtful whether the King by Letters Patent merely can grant the status of British subjects to persons who are not entitled to it at common law and who are not included in the privileged classes specified in the Acts of George II and George III which by implication exclude all persons other than those specially mentioned.

It would I think require an Act of Parliament to do that, and in so far as the letters patent purport to go beyond it, by the grant as to the "heirs" of the original donees, it seems arguable that this grant is inoperative.

There is no doubt, I think, that in law the word "heirs" simpliciter goes far beyond the statutory provisions on the subject. The word "heir" means the person born or begotten in wedlock, of human shape, in allegiance to the Crown, who, according to the English canons of descent, is entitled to the undivided freehold estates of inheritance in England of a deceased person. If words of limitation, such as "of the body," are added, then the direct line of descent only is included, but even then a great grandson of the donee would come within the expression "heirs of the body," while the expression "heirs," without any words of limitation, would or might include collaterals to a remote degree, and not merely the direct descendants born out of England for two generations.

Mr. de Candolle was quite right to refer this matter home before giving Mr. d'Arcis a British passport. It is a very unusual case and raises questions of considerable difficulty.

It must, of course, go to the Home Office for their observations, and very likely they will be able to offer explanations of the form of the letters patent of denization which are not apparent to one who like myself approaches the matter without previous knowledge beyond that which can be picked up from ordinary text-books.

I have thought it better, however, to say how the matter strikes me on the first impression, before we refer to the Home Office, as we must certainly do.

[File 4533/1916]

[April 11, 1916.]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, October 20, 1915.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir E. Grey, to request that you will take into consideration the accompanying copies of correspondence between this Department and the Colonial Office, as shown in the annexed schedule, as to what persons or classes of persons should be held to have acquired British nationality through and by reason of the annexation of Cyprus by His Majesty.

In his letter of the 30th October last (marked (A)), Mr. Secretary Harcourt expressed the opinion that: (1) all Ottoman subjects domiciled in Cyprus; and (2) all Ottoman subjects born in Cyprus and domiciled on British territory, should be treated as British subjects; but that difficulties arose with regard to the status of (3) Ottoman subjects born in Cyprus, but domiciled in neutral or allied States; (4) Ottoman subjects born in Cyprus but domiciled in Turkey; and (5) Ottoman subjects domiciled in Cyprus who might not desire to become British subjects.

As will be seen from the letter from this Department of the 3rd November (marked (B)) and the draft telegram to the High Commissioner of Cyprus therein referred to (marked (C)), Sir E. Grey concurred in thinking that it would be sufficient, for the moment, to declare all Ottoman subjects born in Cyprus and resident there to be British subjects, whilst giving resident Ottoman subjects not born there the opportunity of withdrawing from the island. The telegram in question was sent off on the 1st November, and instructed the High Commissioner to publish, simultaneously with the Order in Council of annexation, a proclamation stating that all Ottoman subjects resident in Cyprus, except those who were not born there and preferred to withdraw within a fixed time limit, would become British subjects.

A memorandum (marked (D)) prepared in this Department bearing on the status of Cypriots before annexation and citing various precedents for giving to the inhabitants of ceded districts the right of choosing their nationality, has also been included with the enclosures to this letter; and the report of the then Law Officers, dated the 25th June, 1901, throws further light on this question.

Annexation of Cyprus: classes of persons who thereby acquire British nationality.

The Colonial Office letter of the 5th December (marked (E)) contains a copy of the proclamation of the 5th November (marked (F)), together with Mr. Harcourt's suggestions for a new proclamation, with a view to avoiding the inconvenience arising from the fact that, under the first proclamation, Ottoman subjects not born in Cyprus could not become British subjects until a whole year after the annexation had elapsed. It was proposed that:—

1. All Ottoman subjects resident in Cyprus at the time of the annexation should be declared to have become British subjects by virtue of the annexation; and that
2. Any such Ottoman subject not born in Cyprus should have the option of resuming his Ottoman nationality within a month from the date of the proclamation.

In his reply (marked (G)), dated the 12th January, Sir E. Grey suggested:—

1. That this power of option should be extended to all resident Ottoman subjects, whether born in the island or not; and that
2. It should be made clear that the proclamation did not grant British nationality to Ottoman subjects not domiciled in Cyprus.

In both these suggestions the Colonial Office concurred by their letter of the 22nd January (marked (H)), whilst renewing their request that the questions with regard to the status of those Ottoman subjects born in Cyprus but not domiciled there should be submitted to you for your opinion and report.

The despatch from Galatz of the 17th March last (marked (I)) calls attention to the difficulties arising in neutral countries by reason of the uncertainty as to the national status of Cypriots, and a copy of a circular telegram, dated the 9th November (marked (J)), is annexed in order to show the temporary arrangements referred to with regard to the issue of passports to such persons.

A letter from the Colonial Office, dated the 19th June (marked (K)), covering a despatch with enclosures from the High Commissioner of Cyprus, is also annexed. The memorandum by the King's advocate of that island forwarded therein raises questions as to the interpretation of the word "resident" in the proclamations of the 5th November and 4th March, and, whilst proposing that this word should be taken to mean "who were in," suggests that facilities should be afforded to Ottoman subjects born in Cyprus and resident elsewhere to acquire British nationality. The Colonial Office, on the other hand, considered that the word "resident" should be held to be equivalent to "domiciled," so that the proclamations should affect Ottoman subjects born in Cyprus only if they were domiciled there, without regard being had to their actual place of residence, as distinguished from their domicile, at the time of annexation.

As you will see from the annexed copy of his reply to the above letter, dated the 6th August (marked (M)), Sir E. Grey is disposed to consider that the proclamation of the 4th March provided only for the case of those persons who, being Ottoman subjects on the 5th November, were actually in Cyprus at the time of annexation, and that residence, not domicile, was made the determining factor (1) because it was essential that the status of residents should be regulated without delay, and (2) because it was a comparatively simple matter to determine who were the persons to whom the term "resident" applied.

A reply, a copy of which forms enclosure (N) to this letter, has, however, been received from the Colonial Office, asking that you should be consulted upon two points, namely (1) as to the interpretation of the words "resident in" in the proclamation of the 4th March; and (2) as to what should be the test of nationality—domicil, residence, or some other, and what, criterion.

I am consequently to request that Sir E. Grey may be favoured with your opinion as to:—

- (a.) Whether domicile, residence, or some other test, ought to be applied in determining who is, or is not, a Cypriot by reason of birth of Ottoman parentage in the island of Cyprus; and, if residence is the test, how that word should be defined.
- (b.) Whether the words "resident in," occurring in the proclamation of the 4th March, should be interpreted as meaning merely "who were in," or "who were ordinarily resident in"; and, whichever of these alternatives be adopted,
- (c.) What is the national status of each of the following categories of persons who were either absent from, or—if the second alternative be adopted—not ordinarily resident in, Cyprus on the 5th November, 1914, and have consequently not been affected by the proclamation of the 4th March:—

I.—If domicile is held to be the test of national status.

1. Those who, by birth in Cyprus, were Ottoman subjects at that date, but were domiciled in a neutral or allied State.
2. Those, of similar birth, who were domiciled at that date in other parts of the Ottoman dominions.
3. Those, of similar birth, who on the date in question were domiciled in enemy States other than the Ottoman dominions.
4. Those, of similar birth, who on the 5th November were domiciled in the British dominions.
5. Those, of similar birth, who on that date were domiciled in any British protectorate or protected States, including Cyprus or Egypt.

II.—If residence is held to be test of nationality.

1. Those who, by birth in Cyprus, were Ottoman subjects on the 5th November, but were resident in a neutral or allied State.
2. Those, of similar birth, who were resident at that date in other parts of the Ottoman dominions.
3. Those of similar birth, who on the date in question were resident in enemy States other than the Ottoman dominions.
4. Those, of similar birth, who on the 5th November were resident in the British dominions.
5. Those, of similar birth, who on that date were resident in any British protectorate or protected State, including Cyprus or Egypt.

Finally, I am to inquire whether, in your opinion, further legislation is advisable with regard to any of the above points; and I am to add that Sir E. Grey would be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general nature which you may consider it desirable to offer on the papers now submitted to you.

Report—

(a.) In our opinion the test to be applied is that of ordinary residence, which is less strict than that of domicile, but is not satisfied by a temporary stay. Persons who are temporarily in the island are not so identified with the conquered territory that their nationality ought to be considered as changed by the fact of conquest.

(b.) The words "resident in" occurring in the proclamation of the 3rd March, 1915, should be interpreted as meaning "who were ordinarily resident in."

(c.) In the light of the above conclusions, none of the persons described under the headings (1) to (5) have a legal right to be recognised as British subjects, but there is no legal reason why the status of British nationality should not be offered to any or all of them. For instance, a proclamation might properly be issued declaring that Ottoman subjects born in Cyprus who on the 5th November, 1914, were resident in the British dominions or in any British protectorate or protected State (including Egypt) are British subjects, but giving such persons an option to retain their Ottoman nationality on giving within a limited time notice of their election so to do; and the same proclamation might (if so desired) give to Ottoman subjects born in Cyprus who on the 5th November, 1914, were resident in a neutral or allied State power by a like notice to elect to become British subjects. The proclamation might of course impose conditions as to coming to reside in the island or taking the oath of allegiance within a specified time. Whether such a proclamation or a proclamation in some other sense should be issued, is a question of policy to be determined by His Majesty's Government.

It does not appear to us that any legislation is necessary or advisable.

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

THE following documents are sent herewith:—

1. Copy of a letter, dated the 23rd April, 1917, from Sir Eyre A. Crowe, with its enclosures.
2. Copy of a letter, dated the 28th May, 1917, from Sir W. Langley, with its enclosures.
3. Memorandum by Dr. A. Pearce Higgins.
4. Memorandum by Mr. J. Wylie.

Detention of Neutral
Ships in British Ports:
Recovery of Damages by Neutral
Shipowners.

The opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown is desired on the question whether the neutral owner of ships which have been detained in British ports at the instance of His Majesty's Government have a remedy in the Courts of this country for such loss as he has sustained.

The facts upon which this question arises are as follows:—

At the inception of the intensified German submarine campaign on the 1st February, 1917, the owners of Danish and other neutral steamships announced their intention of discontinuing, and did in fact discontinue, their sailings to ports in Great Britain. The Danish shipowners' action in this respect was taken with the concurrence of their Government.

At this time a number of Danish vessels were with other neutral vessels in British ports, and with a view to bringing pressure to bear on the Danish Government and on the shipowners to resume sailings to this country, and to ensure the continuance of transport between Denmark and Great Britain and her Allies, instructions were issued by His Majesty's Government that the Danish vessels in British ports should be detained. In pursuance of this policy, the Danish vessels here were refused clearance, until the arrival of a corresponding number of Danish vessels from Denmark. Danish vessels with cargoes from America and overseas bound for Danish ports and calling at British ports for examination were likewise refused clearance until traffic between Denmark and the United Kingdom was resumed. The question is one of great importance because similar action was taken in all ports throughout the Empire in which neutral ships were found at the time, and a great number of claims aggregating a very large sum of money may result.

A claim by a Danish shipowner has already been received, as appears from the documents sent herewith. The claimant is Mr. J. Lauritzen, of Copenhagen, who claims compensation for loss sustained by reason of the detention of seven steamers which he owns, namely, the steamships "Ester," "Thyra," and "Fylla" at Leith; the steamships "Stella," "Laura," and "Marie" at Sunderland; and the steamship "Helga" at Hull. For their detention during the month of February he claims the sum of 17,435*l.*; calculating demurrage at the rate of 50*s.* per ton, deadweight. At the end of the month of March 1917 he put forward a further claim for compensation in respect of the detention of these vessels and the steamship "Olga" at Goole, during that month, calculated as above, amounting to 27,087*l.* 10*s.* The claimant's vessels were at the time of their detention engaged in trading between Scandinavian ports and ports in the United Kingdom and France, and had come into British ports voluntarily.

There are no treaties in existence between Great Britain and Denmark germane to the matter in question.

A similar question arises in connection with the detention at Calcutta of the steamship "Apolo," a vessel flying the Spanish flag, and owned by a Spanish company. This vessel was detained on the 13th, 14th, and 15th February, 1917, in pursuance of the policy, above mentioned; the detention being effected in a similar manner, namely, by the Port Officer refusing the master clearance.

It is not considered to be a material question whether the vessels were actually detained by force or threat of force, or indirectly by refusal to give clearance, or refusal to supply a pilot. Whichever was the method adopted in carrying out the policy which His Majesty's Government had determined to pursue, it may be conceded that for some period of time the vessels were in fact detained by the Executive.

It is the intention of His Majesty's Government to deal with all claims of this character through the diplomatic channel, and it is desired to contest liability should it be raised in a Court of Law. The question therefore arises whether there would be a good defence to a claim for compensation which a neutral shipowner may seek to enforce (a) in the Prize Court against the proper officer of the Crown or the persons actually responsible for the detention of his vessel, or (b) by proceedings in a Municipal Court against the Customs or Port Officer responsible for the detention.

Memoranda by Dr. A. Pearce Higgins and by Mr. Wylie, relative to the matters in question, are sent herewith for the consideration of the Law Officers.

(a.) As regards proceedings in the Prize Court, it is submitted that the Court would take cognizance of the embargo which His Majesty's Government have put on the sailing of neutral steamers, and would give no relief to the applicant (the Boedes Lust, 1 E.P.C., p. 460).

In regard, moreover, to proceedings which might conceivably be instituted against the Procurator-General, it is submitted that in the absence of statutory enactment one person cannot be rendered liable for the wrongful act of another, except on the principle of Respondet superior. The persons concerned in the detention of the vessels were not the servants or agents of the Procurator-General, nor were any orders or directions issued by him in regard to the detention. The Privy Council, however, in the case of the steamship Zamora ((1916), 2 A.C. 77), appear to have regarded the Procurator-General as the proper respondent answerable to claim for damages for wrongful prize seizures.

(b.) In regard to proceedings in the Common Law Courts against the person or persons actually concerned in the seizure, however, the matter seems more doubtful. The Law Officers are referred to the cases of the Gertruyda ((1799), 2 C. Rob. 211); the Boedes Lust ((1804), 5 C. Rob. 233, 1 E.P.C. 459), from which it is submitted that no Court, be it sitting in Prize or a Court of Common Law, would determine a question of fact, or give judgment upon issues, which were at the moment the subject-matter of negotiations between His Majesty's Government and the Government of a friendly State, on the result of which a declaration of war was depending. It is submitted that so long as such negotiations were in progress the Court should refuse jurisdiction.

It may further be contended that the defendant could plead act of State by way of defence (see Buron v. Denman (1848), 2 Exch. 167; Elphinstone v. Bedreechund (1830), 1 Knapp 316; Musgrave v. Pulido, 5 A.C. 102; West Rand Mining Co. v. Rex (1905), 2 K.B. 391; Salaman v. Secretary of State for India (1906), 1 K.B. 613; A.-G. for Canada v. Cain (1906), A.C., p. 546).

That the act in question is an act of State seems clear; but it might be contended that as the act was an act committed within the jurisdiction the defence is not made out. The Civil Courts of this country are open, and are exercising their jurisdiction, c.f. ex. p. Marais ((1902), A.C. 109). It would seem on principle that the act of State would furnish no answer to a wrong committed within the jurisdiction, unless the act was one done under the prerogative for the defence of the realm. It is nevertheless open to question whether the claimant in the present case should be included in the category of those resident within the protection of the King and his Courts, to whose complaint "act of State" would furnish no answer; for it may be contended that Mr. Lauritzen was not residing in temporary allegiance under the protection of English law by reason of the mere fact that he sent his property here.

The Law Officers of the Crown are accordingly requested to advise: Whether proceedings by the neutral shipowner to recover damages by way of compensation for the loss he has sustained by reason of his ships being detained as above mentioned could be successfully maintained against the Procurator-General, and/or against the Customs or Port Officer, or other person actually concerned in the detention (a) in the Prize Court, or (b) in a Municipal Court of Law.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

In our opinion the question submitted to us should, in both its parts, be answered in the negative. We do not think that the Prize Court has any jurisdiction in the matter, inasmuch as the detention of the vessels was not in exercise of the right of visit and search or with a view to seizure of the vessels or cargoes as prize. As to proceedings in the Municipal Courts, we find it difficult to conceive a stronger case of an act of State which, so far as foreigners are concerned, can afford no ground for legal proceedings. The fact that the act was within the jurisdiction is, we think, immaterial. The question is whether the person complaining is a British subject or a person who, because he resides in British territory, and therefore owes temporary allegiance, has in this respect the rights of a British subject (see Feather v. Reg., 6 B. and S., at p. 296; Walker v. Baird (1892), A.C. 491).

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, February 22, 1917.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Balfour to inform you that His Majesty's Minister at Peking has represented to him the extreme necessity of conferring on the British authorities in China certain powers over British subjects analogous to those possessed by the executive in this country under the Defence of the Realm Act, for the purpose of dealing more effectually than is at present possible with the persons, mainly of Indian origin, whose treasonable activities at Shanghai and elsewhere in China are so detrimental to the interests of this country at the present time. Mr. Balfour is satisfied as to the necessity of such action, and I am to enclose for your consideration the draft of an Order in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, which has been prepared in consultation with the India Office for the purpose of taking the necessary powers. Mr. Balfour is advised that the decision of the Court of Appeal in R. v. Earl of Crewe (ex parte Sekgome) (1910) 2 K.B. 576, establishes that an Order of this nature can lawfully be made under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act.

The power which it is most necessary to obtain is that of deportation without the necessity for conviction. Sir John Jordan originally proposed that His Majesty's Minister should be given power to order deportation without reference to His Majesty's Supreme Court for China. You will observe, however, that the draft Order provides in Article 4 that the Supreme Court may make such an order upon a certificate under the hand and seal of His Majesty's Minister. The reason for this alteration is that Section 8 of the Foreign Jurisdiction Act only applies in cases where the order for deportation is made by the Court, and it would, therefore, appear that if the order were made by the Minister as originally proposed, the prisoner would not be in legal custody while on his way from China to the place of deportation. In view of the likelihood that persons whom it is desired to deport may be able to command the necessary financial and legal assistance to take any point of this nature which may be open to them, Mr. Balfour is of opinion that the risk ought not to be run, and it therefore appears necessary that the order should be made by the Court. He has not, however, thought it possible to deprive the Court of any discretion as to making the order upon the certificate of the Minister, but he would propose to instruct His Majesty's representative in China to communicate privately with the Judge of the Supreme Court before issuing his certificate in any case, and to inform him of the reasons which render the deportation of the individual desirable; and he hopes that in this manner, as the Order in Council is only to remain in force during the war, the necessary order may be obtained in all cases where it is required without serious difficulty. It seems, however, advisable to make some provision for a case in which the Court declines to make the order, and with this object Article 2 (d) has been inserted. Internment as distinct from imprisonment is, for practical reasons, not possible in China, but Mr. Balfour proposes to instruct His Majesty's representative, in the event of the Order being passed, that the powers given by Article 2 (d) are only to be used in cases where the Court has declined to make an order for deportation; and as His Majesty's representative may be trusted not to issue his certificate except in a proper case, Mr. Balfour is of opinion that the imprisonment without trial of the person affected may in such circumstances be justified.
